—It's strange how much the world's statesmen are thinking about "unthinkable" wars.

—Seventy-seven per cent of the automobile accidents in New York state last years are said to have occurred in clear weather, and more than 50 per cent of the on straight, level roads.

—A new device that weighs two ounces can be attached to a bird's back to register the number of its wing strokes in flying, and how far the wings move.

—There died recently in a London hospital the only man who struck matches for a living. For 36 years he had been employed to test ordinary and safety matches at one of the great match factories in England.

—The fidelity to detail which is characteristic of the Japanese was never better illustrated than in the recent fly campaign. The government of Tokyo, having offered a bounty on flies, found it necessary to count them when the fly swatters began producing, with the result that the municipal clerks turned in a count of 22,900,000 before the campaign was over.

—Four months after his master's death, Jerry, a 2-year-old bird dog makes a twenty-two-mile pilgrimage to the grave at Seattle, Wash., of C. A. Moodie every day unless he is tied up or forcibly restrained. Jerry was taken in an automobile to the cemetery for the burial. The journey from Jerry's home to the cemetery is eleven miles. The dog follows the route taken by the funeral cortege through streets crowded with traffic.

—Mrs. S. M. Dooley, of Clarendon, Ark., who was shot in the leg but didn't know it, almost bled to death as a result of the accident before she realized what was causing her to get so weak. She was in a motorboat returning with a party of friends from a nut hunt. The shot was from a .22 caliber rifle held by her nephew, Geo. Chidester. After her condition became serious, members of the party said they remembered hearing a faint report, but they had mistaken it for the exhaust of the boat.

—Kern county, Nebraska, lays claim to the oldest big game hunter in the world in the person of Captain C. G. Knowles, Oildale resident, who, at 87 years of age, is back in the mountains with three dogs hunting bears and mountain lions. The captain is a veteran of the Civil War, but still possesses the keen eyesight which made him a marksman and earned his rank more than sixty years ago, according to those who know him well. There are no greenhorns on the trip, for his three dogs are also veterans, with fifty-three lions and almost as many bears to their credit.

—Ever hear of the London bus driver who spends his day off taking a bus ride through the city or the New York letter carrier who takes a good long walk on his day of rest? Well, here comes Captain Conrad Luck, trans-Atlantic skipper, down the gangplank of the Hamburg-American liner Westphalia, at New York, announcing: "Happy to see you boys. Had a month's vacation coming to me, so I thought I would take a short ocean voyage. Going back on this ship to Germany when she sails next Tuesday." And when he goes back on this ship to Germany when she sails next Tuesday." And when he goes back to Hamburg, Captain Luck will assume command of the cruising liner Oceanic. He said: "I can't bear being a landlubber. That's why I asked the company to permit me to make the trip as passenger on the Westphalia."

NEW OFFICIALS OF CITY RELATE SERVICE PLANS

Aims of Administration Are Outlined in Addresses at Chamber of Commerce.

At a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce held Tuesday evening, the new city officials from the mayor to the service director aired their views and told the members of the chamber the plans of administration.

Mayor B. T. Hedges said he would endeavor to give the people of Circleville an administration that they would be proud of. The recent traffic light campaign that he initiated, has met with popular favor, and so far it is a success. All he asks is co-operation on the part of the citizens.

In the next few days another campaign will be started against owners of motor vehicles whose cars are equipped with bad brakes and some that run around with no brakes at all.

Guided by People

Clark Will, the newly elected councilman from the Third ward, said that he was a man at the wheel, and that he would be guided by the wishes of the people who had placed him in office.

E. S. Neuding, the newly elected councilman at large, said that his views coincide with the member from the Third ward. He said that he would do what the majority of the people of this city wanted and asked their cooperation.

L. E. Miller, the newly appointed service director, speaking for the administration, said that he would do everything in his power to keep the city clean and have a Circleville beautiful. He requested that the citizens do all in their power to assist him in his work of cleaning up the town and keeping it clean.

Tells Firm's Plans

Noah Bolender, who has recently moved to this city after years spent on the farm, was called to give a talk, but he declined as also did C. O. Leist, member of council from the First ward.

C. N. Oberling, of Chicago, Ill., purchasing agent for the Container Corporation of America, of which the Mid-West company is an integral part, was introduced by A. C. Moore, resident manager of the Mid-West company. Mr. Oberling said it was the aim of his company to keep the mills here in operation three hundred days in the year if possible.

The company believes in Circleville, he said, and at all times further the interest of the city, which is an obligation cheerfully performed.

Rear Admiral David F. Sellers, U. S. N., in charge of naval affairs in Central American waters, reports that Gen. Sandino's forces are better equipped than there has been reason to think.

ASKS CONGRESS TO APPROVE HIS BUILDING PLANS

Cabinet Member Declares Program Desired to Provide Defense for Country.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11.—(INS)—Declaring that the program was based upon the absolute needs of the nation rather than upon the plans of rival maritime powers, Secretary of the Navy Wilbur vigorously advocated congressional approval of the navy's $750,000,000 building program today before the house naval affairs committee.

The program calls for the following: Two large type destroyer leaders; Twenty-five cruisers of 10,000 tons displacement; Five aircraft carriers; Thirty-two submarines.

Ships are Needed

"It is true," Wilbur asserted, "that in determining this need the general board at all times has taken into consideration the condition of other navies, and their construction and replacement programs so far as they are known to us. But the program we are now presenting to congress is in no sense competitive. It is based upon the need of our navy as it is determined by the secretary upon the technical advice of the general board."

The cruiser program outlined would give the United States an ultimate cruiser tonnage of 396,000 standard tons in 43 vessels.

Twenty-six would be assigned to operation with the battle fleet as "body guards" to the huge 35,000 ton capital ships; fifteen others are needed for the protection of trade routes, and the remaining two as flagships for the destroyer fleet.

Required for Defense

"These cruisers are needed by us to round out our navy as a defensive organization, without reference to the relative strength of other navies. This program does not cover all the foreign interests or trade routes of this nation, but represents a conservative estimate of actual needs."

Nothing in the present program involves either direct or indirect violation of the text or spirit of the Washington conference and the Geneva gathering of last summer to limit cruiser tonnage by treaty, as evidence of America's abhorrence of competitive building.

SIGHTSEEING TOUR IS TAKEN BY LINDBERGH

Youthful Aviator Takes President of Panama for Trip in Famous Plane.

PANAMA, Jan. 11.—(INS)—Further official ceremonies, receptions, and sightseeing tours were in store for Col. Charles A. Lindbergh today as he prepared to spend his last full day here.

Tomorrow the flying Colonel plans to go to Colon, on the Atlantic side of the canal, and on Friday he hopes to hop off again. His exact destination has not as yet been announced.

The highlight of Lindbergh's activities yesterday was acting as pilot for President Chiari during that official's first airplane ride. With his host in the cabin of the Spirit of St. Louis, Col. Lindbergh flew for fifteen minutes above Panama, Ancon and Balboa.

When the plane returned to earth, President Chiari emerged from the cabin with a wide grin on his face and announced that he had been thrilled beyond expectation. After seeing the President's enthusiasm, Vice President Dugue also went for a short aerial jaunt with Col. Lindbergh. He too, was extremely pleased.

Earlier, Col. Lindbergh made two flights above the city in borrowed planes. First he went aloft in a one-seater pursuit plane from Brookfield, and then he took up an all-metal observation plane.

PICKAWAY PIONEER DIES IN COLUMBUS

COLUMBUS, O., Jan. 11.—(UP)—Owen Whisler, 98, in whose honor a town in Pickaway county was named, died at the home of relatives here.

Owen Whisler was a member of the Whisler family that settled in the Prairieview neighborhood of Salt Creek township in 1806. Henry Whisler or Wissler as the name is sometimes spelled, was the progenitor of the family and he came to this county from Pennsylvania at the beginning of 1806. After living here over a half century, the family scattered, some members moving to Columbus and others to Chillicothe.

VIC WILL CONTINUE COAL PEACE EFFORT

COLUMBUS, O., Jan. 11.—(UP)—Governor Donahey will continue his efforts to bring about a conference of miners officials and coal operators despite the formal refusal of the Ohio Coal Operators association to attend a conference called for Jan. 16, by the executive, in an attempt to end the statewide mine strike.

This announcement today followed an executive session of directors of the Coal Operators association here late yesterday at which a letter definitely rejecting the governor's proposal, was drafted and transmitted to the state house. Mine union officials previously, has signified their willingness to attend.

"CLUBBER" IS AGAIN FEARED IN TOLEDO

TOLEDO, O., Jan. 11.—(UP)—Fearing another "clubber" is at large, police here today prepared to round up underworld characters and other undesirables in an attempt to capture the man or men who attacked three women here last night.

Two of the women who said they were attacked, refused to give police their names. The third, Mrs. Thelma Miller, 24, mother of a five months old child, was at her home, verging on nervous prostration.

Mrs. Miller told officers that while she was enroute to a neighborhood grocery two blocks from her home, a man armed with a club, leaped from an alley and struck her down. Her screams, attracting passersby, prevented the man from dragging her into the alley, she said.

The attack recalled activities here 16 months ago of a fiend who clubbed several women to death and dragged their bodies into alleys and vacant lots.

One of the other women attacked, said she fought her assailant off with her fists and teeth.

SOVIET WAR PLANS ARE GOING AHEAD AT FEVERISH PACE

MOSCOW, Jan. 10 —(INS) —War preparations of the Soviets are continuing at a faster pace than ever. Every school pupil and employee is contributing something for the gigantic defense of the realm program which in a few years will make the Soviet union the most generally armed in the world, with every man, woman and child ready to help in some capacity.

"Osoaviakim," the Society for Aerial and Chemical Defense, reported that $3,500,000 has been collected by popular subscription for building of airplanes. Thirty-six bombers were recently delivered to the army out of this fund, and 10 times that number are contemplated. Employees in the administration division of the State theaters are collecting money for a mammoth tank to be named "State Theaters." The artist guild is making up a purse of 20,000 rubles which it will present to the defense fund of the Union.

Thousands of trade union branches buy their own rifles and ammunition. As a result of the expenditures for army and navy noted in the federal budget are only part of the actual military expenses. Millions of people contribute directly as well as through taxation to the defense forces of the country.

The Bureau of Standards at Washington has hit upon a process which will make paper money wear longer. What we should like to have is a system which will make it last longer.—Urichville, O., Chronicle.

The Epic of the Air "WE" By Charles A. Lindbergh

CHAPTER III

I TAXIED up to a fence corner alongside of a small house and proceeded to tie down for the night. I had gained considerable respect for the wind in Kansas and Nebraska, so after turning off the gasoline and letting the motor stop by running the carburetor dry (a safety expedient to keep the ever-present person who stands directly under the propeller while he wiggles it up and down from becoming an aeronautical fatality), I pushed the nose of the plane up to a fence and, after blocking the wheels securely, tied each wing tip to a fence post and covered the motor and cockpit with a canvas in case of rain.

By this time the usual barnstorming crowd had gathered and I spent the remaining daylight explaining that the hole in the radiator was for the propeller shaft to go through; that the wings were not made of catgut, tin or cast iron, but of wood framework covered with cotton or linen shrunk to drum tightness by acetate and nitrate dope; that the only way to find out how it feels to fly was to try it for five dollars; that it was not as serious for the engine to stop as for a wing to fall off, and the thousand other questions which can only be conceived in such a gathering.

As night came on and the visibility decreased the crowd departed, leaving me alone with a handful of small boys who always remain to the last and can only be induced to depart by being allowed to follow the aviator from the field.

I accepted an invitation to spend the night in the small house beside the field.

The next morning I telephoned for a gas truck to come out to the field and spent the time before the truck arrived in the task of cleaning the distributor head, draining the carburetor jet wells and oiling the rocker arms on the engine.

While I was working one of the local inhabitants came up and volunteered the information that he had been a pilot during the war but had not flown since and "wouldn't mind takin' a ride again." I assured him that much as I would enjoy taking him up flying was very expensive and that I did not have a large fund available to buy gasoline. I added that if he would pay operating costs, which would be five dollars for a short ride, I would be glad to accommodate him. He produced a five dollar bill and after warming up the motor I put him in the cockpit and taxied through the mud to the farthest corner of the field. This was to be my first passenger.

The field was soft and the man was heavy; we stalled over the fence by three feet and the nearest tree by five. I found myself heading up a thickly wooded slope, which was sloping upward at least as fast as I was climbing in that direction, and for three minutes my Jenny and the slope fought it out over the fifteen feet of air between them. Eventually, however, in the true Jenny style we skimmed over the hilltop and obtained a little reserve altitude. I had passed through out of those almost-but-not-quite accidents for which Jennies are so famous and which so greatly retarded the growth of commercial flying during the post-war period.

I decided that my passenger was entitled to a good ride after that take-off and kept him up chasing a buzzard for twenty minutes. After we landed he commented on the wonderful take-off and how much he enjoyed flying low over the treetops; again assured me that he had flown a great deal in the war, and rushed off to tell his friends all about his first airplane ride.

The gasoline truck had arrived and after servicing the ship I took off again and headed west. I had no place in mind for the next stop and intended to be governed by my fuel supply in picking the next field.

The sky was overcast with numerous local storms. I had brought along a compass, but had failed to install it on the instrument board, and it was of little use in a suitcase out of reach. The boundary lines in the South do not run north and south, east and west as they do in the Northern States but curve and bend in every conceivable direction, being located by natural landmarks rather than by meridians and parallels. I was flying by a map of the entire United States, with each State relatively small.

I left Meridian and started in the direction of Texas, cutting across country with no regard for roads or railways. For a time during the first hour I was not sure of my location on the map, but soon passed over a railway intersection which appeared to be in the proper place and satisfied me about my position. Then the territory became wilder and again I saw no checkpoints. The storm areas were more numerous and the possible landing fields farther apart, until near the end of the second hour I decided to land in the first available field to locate my position and take on more fuel. It required nearly thirty more minutes to find a place in which a plane could land and take-off with any degree of safety, and after circling the field several times to make sure it was hard and contained no obstacles, I landed in one corner, rolled down a hillside, taxied over a short level stretch and came to rest half-way up the slope on the far side of the field.

A storm was approaching rapidly and I taxied back toward the fence corner at rather high speed. Suddenly I saw a ditch directly in front of me and an instant later heard the crash of splintering wood as the landing gear dropped down and the propeller came in contact with the ground. The tail of the plane rose up in the air, turned almost completely over, then settled back to about a forty-five-degree angle. My first "crack-up!"

I climbed out of the cockpit and surveyed the machine. Actually the only damage done was to the propeller, and although the wings and fuselage were covered with mud, no other part of the plane showed any marked signs of strain. I had taxied back about thirty feet east of the landing tracks and had struck the end of a grass-covered ditch. Had I been ten feet farther over the accident would never have happened. The usual crowd was assembling, as the impact of the "prop" with the ground had been in all the neighboring fields and an airplane was a rare sight in those parts.

They informed me that I was half-way between Maben and Mathiston, Miss., and that I had flown 125 miles north instead of west.

When enough men had assembled we lifted the plane out of the ditch, pushed it over to a group of pine trees and tied it down to two of the trees. After removing all loose equipment I rode into Maben with one of the storekeepers who had locked up his business when he heard about the landing of the plane.

I wired Wyche at Americus to ship me one of the two propellers I had purchased before leaving, then engaged a room at the old Southern Hotel.

While waiting for the propeller I had extracted promises from half a dozen citizens to ride at five dollars each. This would about cover the cost of the "prop," as well as my expenses while waiting for it to arrive. When it did come I put it on the shaft between showers, with the assistance of most of Maben and Mathiston. I gave the plane a test flight and announced that I was ready to carry passengers when it was not raining too hard.

The Mississippians who were so anxious to fly when the propeller was broken immediately started a contest in etiquette. Each and every one was quite willing to let someone else be first, and it required psychology, diplomacy and ridicule before the first passenger climbed into the cockpit. I taxied over to the far corner of the field, instructed my passenger how to hold the throttle back to keep the ship from taking off, and lifted the tail around in order to gain every available foot of space for the take-off.

The first man was so audibly pleased with his ride that the others forgot their manners of a few minutes before and began arguing about who was to be next.

Norwich, Eng., to Have Statue of A. Lincoln

NORWICH, Eng. Jan. 10 —(INS) —Abraham Lincoln is to have a statue erected in his memory here, according to a decision made by the local city council.

America's great president came Norwich stock, his family at one time having resided in the city. The funds for the erection of the memorial will be raised in the United States.

GAS FREE IN OLD TURKISH CAPITAL

CONSTANTINOPLE, Jan. 11 —(INS) —Gas is free in Stamboul, the ancient quarter of the Turkish capital and will be as long as the new concessionaire cannot get the plans of the mains and the accounts from the former holders who say they are lost.

Numerous leaks and cases of asphyxiation are being reported daily but it is impossible to remedy them unless the old cobbled streets are taken up at the concessionaire's expense.

Turkey will soon have plenty of pork, too. For, in spite of the fact that the constitution declares Mohammedanism to be the state religion and the Koran forbids the eating of pork, a factory is soon to be opened in the Vilayet of Odana where wild boars are numerous. They do so much damage to the crops that the hunters will furnish the factory with plenty of supplies.

For some time past, hams, have been imported into Turkey from the Balkans, for there are enough Turks who do not refuse to eat this meat. And Mustapha Kemal says he will never allow the state religion to interfere with Turkish progress.

MALARIA GERMS AID VICTIMS OF PARESIS

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y., Jan. 11 —(INS) —More than one third of the patients suffering from paresis at the Binghamton State hospital have been so improved by the injection of malaria germs into their blood that they have been permitted to leave for their homes, according to Dr. Edward Gillispie, assistant superintendent of the hospital.

An improvement in one half of the patients suffering from this disease, which is caused by blood infection, has been noted, leaving about one third of the entire number unimproved by the treatment. About fourteen per cent of admissions to the institutions are suffering from paresis, Dr. Gillispie said.

While unusual results are being obtained by the treatment authorities do not claim it as a cure but have found that it creates a favorable response in the majority of cases under treatment.

Only Italian Tombs In Tyrol Graveyards

VIENNA, Jan. 11 —(INS) —"Italianization" of the South Tyrol has now been extended to the dead. According to an order issued by the Italian prefect of Bozen, dead Germans buried in the cemetery must change their nationality to Italian. The prefect ordered that all German inscriptions on graves be removed and replaced by Italian epitaphs.

The prefect's action followed his receipt of the following letter from Turati, general secretary of the Fascist party: South Tyrol, this former Austrian territory which owing to the Peace Treaties became a part of the Italian kingdom, must be Italianized in its past as well as in its future.

Austrian relatives of the South Tyrolean dead demand that the League of Nations force the Bozen prefect to rescind his order.

Men of international renown grace its rolls, including Guglielmo Marconi, M. I. Pupin, inventor, Lee DeForest, Gen. G. O. Squier, and other famous inventors and radio technicians.

M. KACHALOV GETS CHALIAPIN' TITLE AS "ARTIST OF PEOPLE"

MOSCOW, Jan. 10 —(INS) —The successor to Feodor Chaliapin's title of "Peoples' Artist," which was withdrawn several months ago because of the famous basso's anti-Communist attitude and failure to return to Russia for a series of concerts, is Vassily Ivanovich Kachalov, one of the most gifted actors in the country.

M. Kachalov is 50 years old and has appeared on the stage of the Moscow Art theater for many years. He has won particular fame in plays by Maxim Gorky, Ibsen and Chekov. The title of Peoples' Artist carries with it more than mere honor. It entitles the recipient to a higher salary, the life use of one or more homes, a pension at full salary in case of disability, and an annuity for his widow and children.

ALL STREET CARS QUIT NEW MEXICO

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M., Jan. 11 —(INS) —New Mexico will be without a street car line in any section of the state within a few weeks following permission granted today by the state corporation commission for abandonment of street cars between East and West Las Vegas.

Permission had already been granted for abandonment of street car lines in Albuquerque.

The Las Vegas and Albuquerque street car lines are the only two street car transportation companies that have been operating in the state for some time.

The Albuquerque line has employed a woman personnel since the war.

In its position for abandonment of the line at Las Vegas, the operators declared that the use of its street cars had decreased until a "passenger thereon is an oddity," and claimed the line had been operating a steadily increasing loss.

Nursing Record In Two Continents Hard to Equal

Nurse Waite of New Brighton writes: "After fifty-five years of tireless labor nursing mankind, I am now retiring."

While nursing in New York, in my early twenties, I was poisoned by food, my sister nurse recommended your wonderful CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS. The doctor told me that I would have died had I not taken the pills.

I am never without them and have prescribed them for thousands of my patients who were suffering with indigestion, gas and sour stomach, biliousness, sick headache and constipation. These pills are indeed a wonderful laxative, being purely vegetable, small and easy to take, children, as well as older people can swallow them easily." Winning Buyers By the Score From Higher Priced Fields

Practically without exception, seasoned motor car owners are appraising the new Hupmobile Six of the Century at hundreds of dollars more than its actual price.

Won by its striking eye appeal and distinction, scores of men and women are cancelling orders for costlier cars—confident that higher expenditure can bring no greater return in beauty, luxury and mechanical excellence.

So eager are local buyers to obtain delivery of this handsome new Hupmobile that demonstrations are being practically dispensed with by purchasers.

If you plan to own a new Hupmobile Six by next spring, we urge you to place your order on record now. Deliveries are being made in strict rotation as orders are received.

FOUR MORE BODIES TAKEN FROM S-4

Sailors of the S. S. Bushnell are here shown holding a basket containing the body of one of the victims of the S-4 disaster just before it was transferred to the U. S. S. Maney at Provincetown, Mass., which brought four corpses in all to the Boston Navy Yard.

SERVING THE PUBLIC

The Circleville Herald is the servant of the people of Circleville and Pickaway county.

Did you ever stop to realize what this city and county would do if it did not have The Circleville Herald? How would you know whether your neighbor in the other end of the city, or county, was alive, if he had no telephone and even if he did you wouldn't want to call him to ask him if he were living. But if The Circleville Herald doesn't contain an item that he has died, you can wager he's still your live old friend.

The world moves on apace. But we would know little of it if there were no newspapers scattered here and there to tell us of it, how new inventions are made, whether Lindbergh landed or fell and was killed, or if that cousin or relative of yours has done something wonderful in another part of the globe.

THE CIRCLEVILLE HERALD

Will shortly add a new list of county correspondents to its already fast growing group of names. More sections of Pickaway county and this territory will be represented than ever before in the history of newspapers in Circleville.

Right now this paper is running such features as these:

"WE," Lindy's story	Dr. Copeland's daily health talks
"CHEVRONS," a serial story	A Daily Fashion Section
A Daily Society Page	A Classified Ad Section
The Cartoon "Jiggs"	The Cartoon "Just Kids"
A Daily Editorial Cartoon	Full Leased Telegraph News Service
A Daily Picture Service	A Complete Daily Wire Market Report

DID YOU EVER HAVE THESE FEATURES BEFORE IN CIRCLEVILLE NEWSPAPERS? BUT THE NEW CIRCLEVILLE HERALD HAS GONE TO A HUGE EXPENSE ADDING ALL THIS, INSTALLING A NEW FAST PRESS WHICH WILL BE IN OPERATION NEXT WEEK, AND IS MAKING AND WILL MAKE MANY MORE IMPROVEMENTS THAT CIRCLEVILLE AND PICKAWAY COUNTY MAY HAVE A LIVE DAILY NEWSPAPER WHICH WILL GIVE THEM SERVICE AND TO WHICH THEY CAN POINT WITH PRIDE.

SPLENDID GAME IS EXPECTED AT ATHLETIC GYM

Full Blooded Indians Will Provide Hard Opposition for Local Players.

In bringing the Seneca Indian basketball team to the C. A. C. court the club is giving the local fans the premier attraction for the season. The Seneca Indians, a team of full blooded redskins will be a novelty for Circleville it being the first time in the history of local basketball that local fans have had an opportunity to see a team composed of Indians. The Indians have an enviable record to their credit. They are coached by R. J. Fischer whom fans will remember through the Buffalo Lincoln team that appeared here last season. And no doubt the same display of good clean basketball will be demonstrated by the Indians as was put out by the Lincolns last season. The club boys have been working hard since last Thursday and are in fine form. The Indians will have to step some to win Wednesday night. Fans can be assured a real fast and interesting game on tap. Let's all go down to the C. A. C. gym and root for the home boys. They have a splendid team this season and deserve much better support than they have been receiving. The public owes the team and the club this support for their efforts to give Circleville good clean athletic entertainment.

TIGERS BEATEN BY 19-14 SCORE BY HILLSBORO 5

Circleville High School Basketball Team Tastes Defeat on Foreign Floor.

The Circleville Tigers went stalking a basketball game in Hillsboro Tuesday night but returned to their lairs with the small end of the score of 19 to 14. It was an initial try-out for a new line-up for the Circleville team, and they didn't seem to get started in their new positions until it was too late to do any business. Hillsboro boasted two teams while

SPORTSMATTER

BY FRANK GETTY
UNITED PRESS SPORTS EDITOR

In another month, the first of the major league baseball squads will be heading south and west for spring training. Sports pages will record the plait of the hold-out and the optimism of the new manager.

The annual salary squabbles will commence and contracts, signed and unsigned, will pass between owner and player.

What is all the old familiar pre-season ballyhoo going to lead to this year?

For one thing, probably another record season for attendance. The national pastime's popularity in many cities is limited only by the capacity of its parks.

Both President Heydler of the National League and President Barnard of the American are well pleased with the "healthy condition" of baseball this year. The child should produce a lot of dividends for its step-parents.

One thing missing thus far this year is scandal. Last winter at this time we had Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker weeping crocodile tears over their disgrace and Rogers Hornsby shouting that he wouldn't sell his pretty St. Louis stock certificates for any reasonable amount of money. "Swede" Risberg was throwing mud at the White Sox of years ago, and someone even went back and dug up a scandal about Casey at the Bat.

All this did baseball a lot of good. It started the prospective cash customers talking. Scandal, you know, never kept anyone away from the turnstile. Tell the paying guests the game is likely to be crooked and they'll crowd in to see how it's done.

Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker made more money than ever before in their lives because of a reported meeting under the grandstand many seasons ago.

Nineteen twenty-eight needs a "Dutch" Leonard.

Several new managers will try their wings this year, among them Rogers Peckinpaugh, Jack Slattery and Burt Shotton.

With the material at his disposal, any one of the three will accomplish a baseball miracle merely by getting his club to the top of the second division.

One can look for improvement this year from the Cincinnati Reds, the Philadelphia Athletics and the Chicago White Sox. The New York Giants are another club that is going to be harder to beat.

The National League race should be another thriller, with the St. Louis Cardinals improved as a team by the fact that Bob O'Farrell now can direct all his attention and energy towards playing ball. The Cubs have only to plug an infield gap to be more dangerous than ever, with "Kiki" Cuyler added to an already high class outfield. The Reds, under Jack Hendricks, will be in there fighting, and with a few additions to his pitching and receiving departments, John McGraw has the Giants just about ready to grab another pennant.

The Pittsburgh Pirates, strengthened by the addition of "Sparky" Adams, who may prove the first real second baseman Barney Dreyfuss has acquired in a decade, will have their work cut out for them if they are to repeat their victory of 1927.

They say the Pirates have found another Warner boy in the wilds of Oklahoma, however, and if it's true it should just about break up the league.

In the American League, from this distance, one can see only the New York Yankees.

Circleville clung desperately to the few old faithfuls. Captain Bales started at forward, but in the second half went back to his first place as guard, and Bob Peters and Frank Marion started at guards, but Peters ended the game at forward with Pickens. Mack played center.

The game up to the third quarter was very slow. Circleville held Hillsboro scoreless in the third quarter. At the end of the half, the score was 11 to 6, in favor of Hillsboro, and at the end of the third quarter, it was 11 to 10. Then both teams proceeded to make a few baskets, and at the finish of the game Hillsboro was five points ahead of Circleville.

The Tigers' points were made by Pickens 4, Dearth, who went in for Marion made 3, Bales 3, Mack 2, and Peters 2.

The high score man for Hillsboro was E. Wright, who made 7 points. Cotterill made 4 points.

SCHAEFFER IN LEAD
NEW YORK, Jan. 11—(INS)—Jake Schaefer was leading Welker Cochran by a score of 1,200 to 801 today in their 3,600 point 18.1 billiard match. Schaefer won the third and fourth blocks by scores of 300 to 109 and 300 to 184. Schaefer made an unfinished run of 122; Cochran's best was 52.

Yes, 1928 will doubtless be a good year all right, but there won't be any more flivvers.—Delaware, O., Gazette.

HORNSBY GOES TO BOSTON IN SURPRISE DEAL
Transfer of Noted Player From New York Giants Astounds Baseball World.

By LES CONKLIN
I. N. S. Staff Correspondent
NEW YORK, Jan. 11—Rogers Hornsby was traded for the best interests of the Giants.

This cryptic sentence was the only official explanation given today for the most astounding trade in modern baseball history, a trade which last night sent the best second baseman in the National League from New York to Boston in exchange for two ordinary players, catcher Frank Hogan and outfielder Jimmy Welsh. No cash was involved in the deal.

The bare and meaningless announcement given out by the New York Club stated that Manager John J. McGraw and President Charles A. Stoneham, "having in mind what we thought to be the best interests of the Giants," had traded Hornsby "after due deliberation." They declined to elaborate on the announcement, interpretation of which bids fair to cause as much speculation in the sporting world as President Coolidge aroused in the political world by his famous "I do not choose to run in 1928."

Reasons Sought
Stunned baseball fans and sports writers, searching for the colored gentleman in the woodpile, today advanced the following possible explanations for the virtual dismissal of the Giants' great batsman:

1. That Hornsby talked too much last year in telling friends what he would do when he became manager of the Giants, following the expected retirement of McGraw.
2. That the New York club wearied of Hornsby's legal difficulties. After refusing to sell his stock in the St. Louis Cardinals until he got his price, Hornsby was the winner of a suit for $94,000 recently brought against him by Frank Moore, Cincinnati betting commissioner, for an alleged gambling debt.
3. That Hornsby's habit of instructing other members of the Giants how to play their position caused resentment and dissension on the team.
4. That the trade was a philanthropic gesture to strengthen the Braves, who are on the rocks financially and have been playing to crowds no larger than a church congregation on a good golfing Sunday.
Plausible Explanation
The last explanation was deemed the most plausible one of the lot. The New York club frequently has played Santa Claus to the Braves in past trades. Instead of being made for the best interests of the Giants, the Hornsby trade may have been made for the best interests of the league. Strengthened by the Great Rajah, the Braves should perk up and draw huge crowds.

Leads As Batter
Hornsby, classed by many observers as the greatest batsman of all time, lead the National League in batting for six consecutive years. In 1922 he clouted 42 home runs, a League record.

McGraw has acquired a much-needed catcher and outfielder, but he will have to make another deal for a second baseman to replace Hornsby unless he elects to take a chance on Andy Cohen, Buck Lai, the Chinaman, or some other rookie. McGraw may get Fresno Thompson from the Phillies, using Welsh in a trade.

Hornsby, in St. Louis, was stunned by news of the trade. And so were New York fans. But one man's wood alcohol is another man's scotch, for Boston fans are already claiming a first division berth.

Metropolitan Feature Film Depicts Life of Crooks in American Cities.
"Underworld," a picture as frank as an expose by a fearless metropolitan newspaper, is flashing its dramatic course on the screen at the Metropolitan theater.
This is one production that is smothering real in its treatment and that is also as absorbing as a drama of modern life.
It is impressive because it makes one think, in addition to being splendid entertainment. The unfolding of the lives of underworld characters in an environment of crime, their methods of preying on organized society, their ferocious struggles with men paid to uphold the law, and the intimate side of their natures in following out impulses and emotions in love and hate, provide the basis of the story written by Ben Hecht for Paramount.
The climax is extraordinarily thrilling, showing how a city street may take on the aspect of a battlefield, with police reserves rushing up to a house where a desperate gangster is trapped and has decided to die fighting. Searchlights, machine guns, grenades, automatic revolvers shields and all the equipment of soldiery come into play when the house is stormed.
The gangland characters are splendidly portrayed by George Bancroft, gangster leader; Evelyn Brent, a girl whose moral consciousness is not awakened until she falls in love; Clive Brook, a man of good breeding who falls into a life of crime; Larry Semon, a crook with a sense of comedy and Fred Kohler, leader of a gang opposing Bancroft.
Josef Von Sternberg, who directed the underworld drama under Hector Turnbull's supervision, has turned out a remarkable fine piece of work.
The picture should cause much comment through its faithful depiction in a story sense of an astounding condition that exists in American cities today.

AVIATION'S GREAT YEAR

ONE of the big developments of 1927, has been the accomplishment of great feats of aviation, particularly in the flights across the Atlantic ocean. The possibilities of flight seem much grander and nearer today than they did a year ago. The year will long be notable in scientific history as one of marvellous development in linking the countries together through the air route.

The dreams of centuries are partly realized through these flights, and the every day use of airplanes by the common run of people seems much nearer than it did.

These flights have not been merely a scientific achievement, but they have had an effect on international politics which few people could have anticipated. Our fliers who landed in Europe have aroused the keenest admiration for American achievement. Col. Lindbergh in his recent very notable flight to Mexico has done wonders in straightening out disagreeable relations between the two countries.

It is coming to be better realized that facility of communication brings countries together in much more cordial relations. The hatreds existing between peoples give way to friendship when they exchange visits frequently. When aviators from the United States are constantly dropping over into Mexico for friendly relations with the Mexican people, something of the distrust with which Americans have always been viewed will disappear.

The aviation interest will start out on 1928 with bright hopes of a year of equally great achievement. Every year the production and operation of airplanes is becoming a more important business. An increasing number of young men with a mechanical turn of mind find it a profitable occupation, and their achievements thrill those of us who still keep our feet on the ground.

LINDY STILL DOES THINGS

THINGS are looking up for the United States when our favorite of the air, Col. Lindbergh, lights down in some foreign country, and the people get a sight of him, and are led to realize what American manhood is at its best.

The Mexican Congress has just passed a law which seems likely to end the unfortunate controversy over oil lands owned by Americans. While this result was largely accomplished by the tactful approach of the American ambassador, the friendly feeling excited by Col. Lindbergh seems to have helped this move along.

The flying Colonel's visits to the Central American countries, which have periods of being sore at Uncle Sam, should calm some ruffled plumage. You sometimes have to make friends with people before you can do business with them.

CROP VALUES INCREASE

THE calculations of the U. S. Department of Agriculture show that the value of farm crops increased $635,000,000 the past year over 1926.

Probably one leading cause of this increased crop valuation, is that a great number of country people, discouraged with conditions in the farming industry, have quit that business and have gone to the cities. That tends to reduce the output. When the supply of anything decreases, but the demand remains the same, then prices rise. Thus the natural working of economic law seems to be doing something to improve the condition of the farmer.

It seems regrettable to see so many people leaving the healthy life of rural neighborhoods and hurrying into cities. But the result of that change is to make conditions better for those who remain and to create a greater demand for their product.

MILLIONS FOR EDUCATION

THE DRIVE for the endowment fund for Yale university recently reached the sum of $20,000,000, and is still growing. This great sum will do good work, particularly in encouraging men of fine personality and brilliant ability to remain in the teaching profession, and use their influence to help inspire young men.

Hundreds of less famous institutions of learning, many of them small in numbers but fine in influence, should also get a share of the wealth of the country. The little college or academy in some rural section, not famous beyond the confines of its state, often exercises a wonderful influence on youth.

The officers and teachers of such schools are apt to work for very little pay, but they are inspired by seeing the results in manhood and womanhood that they turn out. While lavishing their generosity on the big colleges, the men of wealth should not forget the more struggling institutions, where the professors wear shiny coats, and the buildings need a bath of paint.

A GREAT BUG FIGHTER

D. R. O. L. HOWARD, who recently resigned as chief entomologist of the U. S. agriculture bureau, after 33 years service, has had a remarkable record in fighting insect pests. We can see the result of his efforts in Ohio.

His publications on the diseases carried by the house fly were largely responsible for the nation wide effort to stamp out that pestiferous little creature.

Many of us can remember how terribly careless the old timers were about the fly pest. A perfect swarm of flies would come in through poorly screened houses and light on the food, contaminating the nourishment the people were about to assimilate. No wonder they got sick. We all owe a debt to these quiet scientists who are constantly working to exterminate the foes of man.

THE GREAT WAR TEN YEARS AGO TODAY

—(U. P.)—

JAN. 11, 1918

The German Chancellor considers making a reply to the American executive's statement.

HE HAS A WASHING TOO

ENERGY BURNED UP SAME AS GASOLINE

Dr. Copeland Tells About the Advice He Gave to an Airman Who Wanted to Stay Awake Sixty Hours.

By ROYAL S. COPELAND, M. D.
United States Senator from New York.
Former Commissioner of Health, New York City.

A FEW weeks ago I had a telegram from a famous aviator. He told me of a contemplated endurance flight and asked me to suggest the foods best adapted for persons attempting a sixty-hour effort.

What would you say in reply to such a query? Sixty hours in your comfortable home would not be regarded as a long time. But I imagine that sixty sleepless, anxious, watchful, dangerous hours would make terrific demands upon mind and body.

One can go without food for sixty hours and not suffer anything more than pangs of hunger. But sixty hours in an airplane without sleep, and under the strain of constant flight, must make it important to keep the system in the fittest possible state.

In the first place, it is important to keep the system cleansed from poisons which might lessen the alertness of brain function and nerve response. To avoid this danger it is necessary to take an abundance of water.

Every cell of the body is bathed in fluid. To nourish it and cleanse it, there must be constant renewal of the fluid. In a sense, the cells and fibres of the body must be washed.

As I think about it, it is important to drink lots of pure water. That is the first item of advice to give the aviator.

In an air flight there is exposure to extreme cold. The body must be guarded against this and kept warm as possible, or its functions will be disturbed.

To meet the emergencies of the effort, to operate the mechanism of the plane, to keep awake and alert, there must be expended a tremendous quantity of energy.

Heat and energy are given the body by the burning up in its tissues of certain foods, called the "carbohydrates." These are the starches and sugars. The fats contribute in the same way.

The next thing to think about, is to feed the fats and carbohydrates. Cream, sugar, sweet chocolate, bread and portions of cheese, are splendid foodstuffs to supply these elements.

You will see why I recommended chocolate bars, cheese sandwiches, and lots of cream and sugar added to the coffee. The starch of the bread, the fat of the cream, and the sweet things will furnish heat and energy.

Of course there is need of foods to sustain and restore the muscles. The proteins satisfy this need. For this reason I advised the white meat of chicken and the cheese, which is rich in protein.

Certain minerals are needed the whole wheat bread will supply these, or some of them. Coffee is stimulating and helps to keep one awake and alert.

In my telegraphic response, I said: "Take chocolate bars, whole wheat cheese sandwiches, white meat of chicken and hot coffee rich in sugar and cream, in thermos bottles. Drink plenty of water and try to take food at regular intervals of about four hours."

Such a menu would serve not only an aviator but anybody who needed concentrated meals. But of course, fruits, vegetables and milk should be added when the diet is to be continued for a long time. Do you agree with my menu?

Answers to Health Queries

K. C. M. Q.—What can be done for a strain in the region of the heart—would digitalis be helpful? It has persisted for three years.

A.—Digitalis might be very helpful but should be advised by your doctor who is naturally familiar with your condition. A heart affection demands specific attention in every instance. It is very important to avoid all undue exertion and excitement and to live a regular, normal life.

A. K. Q.—Would a heart condition in a boy of eleven, where two valves of the heart are open cause bleeding from the mouth two or three times daily—the boy is the picture of health otherwise?

A.—Possibly—why not have the doctor familiar with the child's condition advise you along these lines? Copyright, 1928, Newspaper Feature Service, Inc.

WORK IS STARTED ON BUREAU HOME

Agricultural Organization Begins Excavation for Office Building in Columbus.

Excavation for the new Columbus headquarters of the farm bureaus of Ohio was started last week, according to word received at the office of the Pickaway County Farm Bureau. The completed building, providing weather for building activity is favorable, will be ready for occupancy about May 1.

Announcement of the intentions of farmers to have their own headquarters in the Capital city was made here nearly two months ago. At that time the Ohio Farm Bureau Corporation, a subsidiary of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation, purchased a 99 year lease on property on East Broad street, six blocks from the State capital. Officials first planned to have the new building ready for reception of delegates at the annual meeting of the farm bureaus in Columbus on Jan. 30 and 31, but this plan had to be abandoned.

The building started last week is to be a two-story brick structure and basement containing 20,000 feet of floor space. Built as a permanent structure, it will adjoin the building already on the property to house headquarters of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation and all its affiliated groups, giving farmers of the state their first permanent headquarters.

In addition to furnishing office space for the state farm bureau the new headquarters will serve the Ohio Livestock Cooperative association, the Farm Bureau Mutual Automobile Insurance company, the Ohio Farm Bureau corporation, the Ohio Farm Bureau Service company, the Eastern States company (a subsidiary of the livestock cooperatives) and certain branches of the work of the Ohio Wool Growers Cooperative association, dairy associations and other cooperative groups of the state.

SHANGHAI, Jan. 11—(UP)—Two coolies face trial in the Provisional Court for the brutal murder of Mrs. E. T. Forestier, British resident of this city who was slain with a hatchet.

One of the accused was arrested 60 miles from Ningpo where he was hiding in a cave. The second arrest was made in Shanghai upon information furnished by the first coolie.

Mrs. Forestier was found lying in a pool of blood in the kitchen of her home. Her head had been nearly severed.

When man can
Just as well
Be glad,
Why act that way,
You're just a
Cad
You know, my Friend, you can be
Gay
So toss away
That word "dismay,"
When troubles
Come
Just smile, and soon
Your winter snows
Will change
To June
And Life will always
Be at noon,
Now why can't you
As well be
Gay
As harboring
This word
"Dismay?"—

And what we mean to say
Is,
The way this old world
Treats you, friend,
From the beginning
To the end
And when you trip
Around Life's bend
Is up to you,
If you'll be gay
The sun will shine
'Most every day;
Be glad and vow
That you will find
That everyone is
Good and kind
And do your best to
Please mankind;
There is no sense in
This dismay,
When you can just
As well be gay.

My New Year vows are broken now,
But that won't make me sore,

I'll probably make some more.

Husband calling, notes Bob Ryder, has become such a sport that we never pay the slightest attention any more unless we feel like it, explaining in our innocent way afterwards that we supposed of course she was just practicing for the next national contest.

But how many times do you get away with an explanation like that, Bob?

No use in doing that,
And not a bit of fun in bliss

"G-d-d-n it!" yelled Eadie and added his opinion of the gun and the man that invented it. There was still half a belt, it must be a jam. Eadie pounded the breech, pulled the belt snapped the lever, did everything he could think of. Then he noticed that the bottom of the cylinder glowed a dull red. Ah! The water in the German gun is only sufficient to keep it cool for four belts. After that time the cylinder must be refilled. Eadie had never thought of that, but then machine gunners are not made in a day. The barrel had become hot, had buckled, and now the gun had fired its last shot. Specks danced before Eadie's eyes. He could see nothing but the empty field, liberally dotted with German dead.

Once more Eadie rested his head on his arms. Jake came and sat down beside him. "Why, Jake was lying dead over there behind the hedge under Eadie's overcoat. Jake grinned; nevertheless, and extended his huge hand. Was it really Jake? Why, no. There was a girl there, dressed in black, with a white cap and apron. She held out a platter on which was a huge steak, garnished with butter.

"Oh, G-d!" shrieked Eadie. He staggered and fell across the breast of the gun. Three nights and two days without sleep, or rest, or food and all the time under the strain of battle. Sergeant Eadie had collapsed.

CHAPTER VII

Behind the Guns

Eadie opened his eyes with a start and was about to struggle, but the men that held him wore khaki uniforms, and their faces were sympathetic and kindly.

"Where yuh hit, buddy?" asked one. It was day and rain fell heavily. The field that had been so lonely the night before was covered with Americans, walking steadily, their rifles over their shoulders, and their bayonets dripping rain. As far as the eye could see they marched along.

"Where yuh hit?" asked the man again. Eadie tried to speak, but no words came. Practiced hands turned him over and explored under his blouse. "He's all right," said some one. "There's no blood an' I don't feel a thing."

"Yes," said a third voice, "shock

and gas, write it down. What's the name on that dog tag?"

"Here!" cried Eadie. "I'm all right. I just fell asleep a minute or two." His mind began to clear a little and he could see that there was an unfolded stretcher on the ground, that one of the men who had supported him was evidently a bearer, and that the other man was a doctor, for his collar bore the insignia of an officer of the medical corps.

"Sure," said the doctor, "we know we're just going to fix it so you can have a little more sleep. You've got a little whiff of gas, I know the signs."

"No, no!" shouted Eadie, so that even the marching men turned to look at him. "I tell you I'm all right. Let me alone! I was evacuated for gas once before and I've had enough razz berries handed me ever since to keep the A. E. F. in jam a hundred years. Nix on that stuff. I'd spit my lungs right out on the ground and kick 'em over the bank before I'd go out for gas. No, sir! No more jawbone wound stripe for mine. One is enough." His hand flew to his holster and the gun seemed to leap out to meet it. Eadie swung the muzzle at the doctor and the stretcher bearers. It was lucky that it was empty, for his hand gripped trigger and butt-safely in a drowning man's clutch.

"Get the h-l away from me!" growled the sergeant. The doctor and his assistants complied immediately with more haste than dignity. A crazy man and a .45 are as dangerous a combination as gasoline and a match. Eadie watched them go grimly, then holstered his pistol and walked aimlessly up the hill a little way. "That's the way to handle the medical corps!" he muttered.

On the hilltop he paused. There was a wall of smoke far to the north that marked a barrage and tall black plumes in the distant fields showed where enemy shells were falling among the advancing troops. Along the hedge that marked the sunken cart path was a long line of recumbent figures, to which additions were constantly being made. These must be dead. Of the bitter conflict of the night before there was no sign except the German dead lying thickly and the blackened pile of junk that had been an enemy airplane. Jake was over there, and Lieutenant Connor, who, if he did not know much about being an officer, at least knew how to die like one. Eadie guessed that the Americans had made a general advance at daybreak. His watch now told him it was eight o'clock. The survivors of the garrison of the sunken road had probably gone on with the advance, or else had been relieved and sent to the rear.

"I'm going to be relieved, too," decided Eadie. If the ambulance could come up that road from the gulch then he could get out that way, decided the sergeant. He went down into the gulch, not looking at the dead Germans there and so up the opposite slope. Here the road joined another and Eadie took the south fork. Immediately he met infantry marching in column, a whole brigade, he thought, until he noticed the fresh uniforms, the shaver faces, and the brand new equipment. Replacements, these men were, going up to fill up the depleted ranks of some division. No, that wasn't it, he cause replacements wouldn't be marching in column so near the front. This must be a fresh, untired division, going in to see what it could do.

"Where yuh goin'?" called Eadie. "To Berlin!" the men answered him with a cheer.

Eadie was moved to laugh hoarsely. "There's bad boys up there in the woods that'll splash your new clothes all over mud," he called. "That Berlin road is kinda rocky."

A column of artillery, some Three Hundred and Something regiment that Eadie had never heard of followed the infantry, and batteries of artillery, in the open and with no attempt at camouflage spat flame and shells at the enemy. From time to time tanks waddled across, looking like a flock of ducks in search of a pond.

A two-wheeled cart appeared around a turn and came bobbing toward Eadie. This cart had a tank on it and was used for carrying drinking water. The interesting thing about it was that it had upon its side the words, "Battery A," and the man that drove it was one Cracker Coombs, a man well known to Eadie.

"Hey!" called the sergeant, standing up.

"Hiyuh, sahgunt," replied Cracker, reining up. "Wanta ride? Climb on." Eadie complied gladly enough. "Where's the battery?" he asked, as Cracker clubbed his horses forward once more.

"Down the road a piece," replied the driver. "It's a h-l of a long way to come to waituh three an' to times a day. Where yuh been at, sahgunt, again?"

"I'll say," agreed Eadie. "I've had enough of it for a while. The battery been doing anything?" "Ain't fired nary a shot yet. We had two showdown inspections and a review parade. It was a good one, too, only two o' them boche planes flew over an' broke it up."

"That's a h-l of a way to fight a war," remarked Eadie. "How come haven't they got any ammunition or what?"

"I ain't studyin' about that a-tall," said the driver. "I got to tote watruh whether they fights or not. I heared we was to back up some regiment but they took foot in hand an' done gon an' to one knew what to shoot."

"Umh!" said Eadie. "well, maybe that's right. I was with an outfit an' didn't hear an American shell for two or three days. How's the outfit feedin' now?"

"Right slim!" said the driver. In a few minutes the cart turned off the road and Eadie was home. From the seat of the cart he could see the battalion strung out along a field, the guns of the three batteries in position behind them piles of shells, and the gunners sitting idly around in shell cases smoking.

A long line of harnessed limbers hid themselves in the shadow of a row of trees. Men wandered aimlessly about, some shaved or cleaned the mud from their clothing, others dug themselves dugouts, some slept. Behind a clump of bushes was a pile of helmets, rifles and miscellaneous equipment, with here and there a patch of white cloth. Signs such as these pointed to the presence of a dressing station in those bushes, and that pile of arms contained the equipments and weapons taken from the wounded.

"Here we are," cried Eadie, leaping down. The water cart always stopped near the kitchen thus bringing Eadie immediately to the place he sought. "How's chances on chow?" cried the sergeant.

"Ain't got much chow," said the cook dubiously. "Spud and the mess sergeant are off to see can they find a ration dump to steal a little for supper. We just got through with breakfast an' I put on everything I had."

"D-n and d-n," cried Eadie. "I haven't set my teeth into food for three days!" The men were all looking sadly at each other when the first sergeant suddenly appeared.

"Ha! Sergeant Eadie!" he cried. "They had the rumor around this morning that you were dead. I knew it was a lie. I bet you found a steam heated dugout I hear the boche have the major wants to see you the minute you get back. I think he's got a new job for you. Maybe he's going to send you to officers' training camp. There's a detail goin'. Go see him. You better shave first, though, and clean yourself up a little."

"That's right," said the cook. "You go shave an' see the major an' when you come back I'll have somethin' for you to scoff."

"Where's the liaison detail hang out?" asked Eadie.

"Soft," replied the first sergeant. "They got an old Jerry dugout up on the hill there."

Eadie went in the indicated direction, after filling his canteen at the water cart. The dugout he found easily, for Baldy was in the doorway. "Well, I'm d-d!" exclaimed Baldy. "Yuh look like yuh been to war."

"Well, I haven't," said Eadie. "I've been snipe hunting. How's everything?"

"Ah, I knew it was you!" cried a voice, and Short Mack poked his child's face from the door. "I dreamed about money last night. What's the matter, did the M. P.'s chase you back?"

"I'm going to shave," said Eadie,

bitting forward his musette. "That's something Short Mack can't do."

The sergeant removed slicker, belt, and blouse. His gas mask he laid handily by and the major's field glasses beside it.

"Where'd you get them?" cried Short.

"A little bird flew down with 'em in his beak," answered Eadie, laying out his shaving tools.

"You're the cheapest illegitimate I know!" foamed Shorty. "If you had brains enough to be simple, I'd knock your nose off its trunnions! Gimme a look through 'em."

Short took the glasses and began to sweep the horizon with them, while Eadie lathered his face.

"Where's the red-headed guy?" asked Baldy.

"He's dead," Eadie lathered in silence and then laid the brush gingerly on his gas mask. "Hold the mirror will you?" he asked.

"What did it, shell or grenade?" asked Baldy, holding the steel mirror before Eadie's face.

Scrape, scrape, went the razor. Eadie pulled his nose out of the way removed a budding mustache and shook the soap onto the ground. "Bullet," said he. "They had a machine gun up and he stopped one. He died in a minute."

"Uh," grunted Baldy. He changed hands on the mirror and watched Short sweeping the horizon with the major's glasses. Eadie continued to shave. Jake's death had slight effect on these two, he thought, but then they had not known him very well.

He, the sergeant, was not as affected as he might have been. He was surprised at this himself. But then how many men had he met, good lads all, in hospital in the States, in the casual company, on the transport, in rest and replacement camp, on trains, all of them, and down France, infantrymen, artillerymen, engineers, police, men of every branch of the service. Good lads they were, and he had talked and joked and drunk with them a day or two, even a week, then they were gone and he never saw them again. He did not even know their names. Mike, Red, Hoop, Corporal, the Barber, N'Awins, they were called. Where were they now? True, he might meet them again, but Jake he was sure he would never see. A slight chill went down his spine then. Who could tell what minute he or Short or Baldy might follow the same path that Jake had taken?

"That's a sorry shave you're givin' yourself," remarked Baldy.

"I know it," said Eadie, "but I'm in kind of a hurry. The major wants to see me. Now, then, Short; give us those glasses. You know I'm a bird that keeps everything valuable right on me."

The battalion P. C. Eadie found easily enough. It was in another German dugout, evidently a large one. At the door he paused and made some attempt to brush off his clothes, but the task was hopeless. Anyway, it would be better to go in a battle-stained warrior. The effect would be more dramatic. Eadie knocked.

"Come in!"

The sergeant lifted aside the blanket that served as door and stepped in. A number of lanterns lighted the place, and Eadie could see a table, a telephone, maps, fungus-whitened beams, and the dim outlines of three officers. With difficulty, Eadie discovered the major, sitting at the table.

"Sir," said Eadie, saluting. "I was directed to report to the major, I'm Sergeant Eadie of A battery." He squared his shoulders as he spoke, and felt a little sorry that the light was so poor and hence the officers could not see his wound stripe.

The major swung around in his chair and looked Eadie from top to toe.

"Sergeant Eadie, oh, yes," he said quietly. "You were detailed to go forward with the infantry September 23. weren't you? Where have you been ever since?"

"Sir," began Eadie, "the division went to bits. The officer we were with was killed and the battalion commander after him. We stayed until night, all the officers we knew were killed, the men were retiring, and so we retired, too."

"Did you ask for any fire during the day?"

"Yes, sir," said Eadie, "we fired a rocket in the afternoon, but the barrage only lasted a few minutes."

"That's right," spoke up an officer from the shadows. "You remember major, that the brigade called up and made us cease firing because the shells were bursting about two miles in rear of the line reported by the airplane?"

"Where did you go the next day? Why didn't you come back?"

"Well, sir, we were on the way back when we met Lieutenant Connor and he made us go along to help lay wire."

"Lieutenant Connor? He isn't with this regiment any more?"

"He had a Signal corps detail from the Third brigade, sir."

"Well, he might have that. He was transferred to another regiment of the brigade. The brigade was split up at the opening of the attack and he might have had a detail from the Third brigade, but that doesn't allow you to go with him."

"He ordered me to go with him, sir, and I thought he was still with the regiment."

"Where's Lieutenant Connor now?"

"He's dead, sir."

"Well, where's the man that went with you?"

"He's dead, too."

"Oh, he is? Humm. Now, listen. We had a little affair with you on the Marne. You were sent out to find a bridge and if we'd waited for your report, we'd still be at Chateau Thierry. There was some kind of a rumor around that you were gassed. I think if a certain general order were extended to include gas cases there'd be a d-d sight fewer evacuations for gas. Well, this time you do the same stunt. There's been too much of this going out on detail and turning up a week later, with some feeble alibi. I think I've got you. Anyway, you're under arrest while I investigate. Tell your B. C. and your first sergeant. That's all."

The sergeant saluted and went out. He was tired, his legs ached, and his mind craved sleep. Between the Germans and his own officers, a man had a tough time in this war. On to the kitchen then. At the kitchen he filled his cup with coffee and the cook, wiping his hands on his apron, took off the stove a messkit full of some kind of gray matter.

"What's this?" demanded Eadie. "It's good for yuh," replied the cook. "Eat it. It's bacon grease an' flour, with them pavin' stone biscuits stirred up in it."

Eadie proceeded to eat. The stuff tasted good, especially since it was his first real meal in several days. His head reeled a little bit from fatigue and his legs kept going to sleep. He sat on a ration box, his back to the warmth of the rolling kitchen, and ate, drank coffee, and thought upon his lot. Jake had the luck after all. What was there in this war for a man? Work and fight and sleep in the mud and go without food, and be bedeviled by officers all the time. Three days of fighting and killing. Perhaps tonight he would have to go on the lines again. Winter was coming on and it was going to get colder every day. All honor to the French and British who had stood this misery for four years. As for his own particular troubles, they were annoying, but not serious. He could find some member of the wire-stringing detail, or even Lieutenant Harvey to testify for him. The general would say whether he had been a goldbrick or not. He had captured a machine gun single-handed, which was not a task performed by goldbricks.

"How's it go?" asked the cook.

"Good," said Eadie. "I've eaten lots worse. I wish I had some soft bread to wipe out my messkit with." He got up and walked toward the water cart, intending to rinse out his cup.

Whoa! A sudden swelling roar, a roar like that of a lion a thousand times magnified. A shell! A near one! Eadie went for the ground but he felt iron going into him ere he started.

When things cleared a little bit, he found himself on the ground, lying on his side. He opened his eyes and then raising his head looked about him. The place was deserted. Far away some one called wildly, but there was no one in sight. Eadie looked the other way. A column of steam hid the place where the rolling kitchen had been, but Eadie could hear hissing and see a shattered blackened wheel, and the wreck of a marmite can lying on the ground. Beyond the marmite was the cook, one leg gone, and dead. The K. P. lay a little farther away, also dead, horribly so.

Eadie lay down again quietly. He was hit and hit bad, he could tell by the way he felt. And he had been hit right between the guns, in front of the entire battalion. A real hit. No more sound-off about lawbone wound stripes! No more wise cracks about going over the hill! The ground felt soft and comfortable. Right in back of the guns! That shell had been a fast traveler. How many years ago had it been when he had told Ham that a shell could be heard five seconds before it burst? This latest arrival had hit roared once and Eadie had felt its claw almost as soon as he heard the roar. There were feet pounding now, muttered comments, excited cries.

"Battery A's kitchen!"

"They're all dead! —! Lookit the cook!"

"Get back, men, don't gang up around here! Get back! Another shell may land any minute! Where's the doctor?"

A dozen hands turned Eadie over and he could see a circle of white faces looking at him.

"Where'd it get yuh?" they cried.

"In the side," answered the sergeant. He was surprised to hear how natural his voice sounded. There were men there he knew, looking at him as though he were some strange and fearful object. Off came his belt, his blouse was torn open, up with the shirt, and Eadie, raising one elbow, saw IT. A great bunch like an inverted cup and in the center of this bunch a round jagged hole, with a tiny splash of blood on one side. He lay down again and gritted his teeth at the sting of the iodine.

"Got any more?" asked the first-aid man who was putting on the bandage.

"No, that's the only one," said Eadie. "Did it go in?"

"Yup, it went in."

"I don't feel weak or anything, I don't want to get shoved out with a flesh wound."

"CLUBBER" IS AGAIN FEARED IN TOLEDO

TOLEDO, O., Jan. 11.—(UP)—Fearing another "clubber" is at large, police here today prepared to round up underworld characters and other undesirables in an attempt to capture the man or men who attacked three women here last night.

Two of the women who said they were attacked, refused to give police their names. The third, Mrs. Thelma Miller, 24, mother of a five months old child, was at her home, verging on nervous prostration.

Mrs. Miller told officers that while she was enroute to a neighborhood grocery two blocks from her home, a man armed with a club, leaped from an alley and struck her down. Her screams, attracting passersby, prevented the man from dragging her into the alley, she said.

The attack recalled activities here 16 months ago of a fiend who clubbed several women to death and dragged their bodies into alleys and vacant lots.

One of the other women attacked, said she fought her assailant off with her fists and teeth.

NEW OFFICIALS OF CITY RELATE SERVICE PLANS

Aims of Administration Are Outlined in Addresses at Chamber of Commerce.

At a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce held Tuesday evening, the new city officials from the mayor to the service director aired their views and told the members of the chamber the plans of administration.

Mayor B. T. Hedges said he would endeavor to give the people of Circleville an administration that they would be proud of. The recent traffic light campaign that he initiated, has met with popular favor, and so far it is a success. All he asks is co-operation on the part of the citizens.

In the next few days another campaign will be started against owners of motor vehicles whose cars are equipped with bad brakes and some that run around with no brakes at all.

Guided by People

Clark Will, the newly elected councilman from the Third ward, said that he was a man at the wheel, and that he would be guided by the wishes of the people who had placed him in office.

E. S. Neuding, the newly elected councilman at large, said that his views coincide with the member from the Third ward. He said that he would do what the majority of the people of this city wanted and asked their cooperation.

L. E. Miller, the newly appointed service director, speaking for the administration, said that he would do everything in his power to keep the city clean and have a Circleville beautiful. He requested that the citizens do all in their power to assist him in his work of cleaning up the town and keeping it clean.

Tells Firm's Plans

Noah Bolender, who has recently moved to this city after years spent on the farm, was called to give a talk, but he declined as also did C. O. Leist, member of council from the First ward.

C. N. Oberling, of Chicago, Ill., purchasing agent for the Container Corporation of America, of which the Mid-West company is an integral part, was introduced by A. C. Moore, resident manager of the Mid-West company. Mr. Oberling said it was the aim of his company to keep the mills here in operation three hundred days in the year if possible.

The company believes in Circleville, he said, and at all times furthers the interest of the city, which is an obligation cheerfully performed.

SIGHTSEEING TOUR IS TAKEN BY LINDBERGH

Youthful Aviator Takes President of Panama for Trip in Famous Plane.

PANAMA, Jan. 11.—(INS)—Further official ceremonies, receptions, and sightseeing tours were in store for Col. Charles A. Lindbergh today as he prepared to spend his last full day here.

Tomorrow the flying Colonel plans to go to Colon, on the Atlantic side of the canal, and on Friday he hopes to hop off again. His exact destination has not as yet been announced.

The highlight of Lindbergh's activities yesterday was acting as pilot for President Chiari during that official's first airplane ride. With his host in the cabin of the Spirit of St. Louis, Col. Lindbergh flew for fifteen minutes above Panama, Ancon and Balboa.

When the plane returned to earth, President Chiari emerged from the cabin with a wide grin on his face and announced that he had been thrilled beyond expectation. After seeing the President's enthusiasm, Vice President Duque also went for a short aerial jaunt with Col. Lindbergh. He too, was extremely pleased.

Earlier, Col. Lindbergh made two flights above the city in borrowed planes. First he went aloft in a one-seater pursuit plane from Brookfield, and then he took up an all-metal observation plane.

PICKAWAY PIONEER DIES IN COLUMBUS

COLUMBUS, O., Jan. 11.—(UP)—Owen Whisler, 98, in whose honor a town in Pickaway county was named, died at the home of relatives here.

Owen Whisler was a member of the Whisler family that settled in the Prairieview neighborhood of Saltcreek township in 1806. Henry Whisler or Wissler as the name is sometimes spelled, was the progenitor of the family and he came to this county from Pennsylvania at the beginning of 1806. After living here over a half century, the family scattered, some members moving to Columbus and others to Chillicothe.

VIC WILL CONTINUE COAL PEACE EFFORT

COLUMBUS, O., Jan. 11.—(UP)—Governor Donahey will continue his efforts to bring about a conference of miners officials and coal operators despite the formal refusal of the Ohio Coal Operators association to attend a conference called for Jan. 16, by the executive, in an attempt to end the statewide mine strike.

Mine union officials previously, has signified their willingness to attend.

ASKS CONGRESS TO APPROVE HIS BUILDING PLANS

Cabinet Member Declares Program Desired to Provide Defense for Country.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11.—(INS)—Declaring that the program was based upon the absolute needs of the nation rather than upon the plans of rival maritime powers, Secretary of the Navy Wilbur vigorously advocated congressional approval of the navy's $750,000,000 building program today before the house naval affairs committee.

The program calls for the following craft, to be constructed over a five year period.

Twenty-five cruisers of 10,000 tons displacement:

Five aircraft carriers;
Two large type destroyer leaders;
Thirty-two submarines.

Ships are Needed

"It is true," Wilbur asserted, "that in determining this need the general board at all times has taken into consideration the condition of other navies, and their construction and replacement programs so far as they are known to us. But the program we are now presenting to congress is in no sense competitive. It is based upon the need of our navy as it is determined by the secretary upon the technical advice of the general board."

The cruiser program outlined would give the United States an ultimate cruiser tonnage of 396,000 standard tons in 43 vessels.

Twenty-six would be assigned to operation with the battle fleet as "body guards" to the huge 35,000 ton capital ships; fifteen others are needed for the protection of trade routes, and the remaining two as flagships for the destroyer fleet.

Required for Defense

"These cruisers are needed by us to round out our navy as a defensive organization, without reference to the relative strength of other navies. This program does not cover all the foreign interests or trade routes of this nation, but represents a conservative estimate of actual needs."

Nothing in the present program involves either direct or indirect violation of the text or spirit of the Washington conference and the Geneva gathering of last summer to limit cruiser tonnage by treaty, as evidence of America's abhorrence of competitive building.

SEARCH FAILS TO UNCOVER BANDITS

Despite a diligent search by Sheriff Frank Davis and his deputies, no trace has been found of the two bandits who held up and robbed Miss Mary Kibler, cashier of the Prudential Insurance company office on West Main street of $175 Tuesday morning. Extensive inquiries by the sheriff's office have failed to locate anyone who saw the men enter or leave the stairway leading to the office and the victim of the holdup was able to supply only a meager description of the men.

SOVIET WAR PLANS ARE GOING AHEAD AT FEVERISH PACE

MOSCOW, Jan. 10 —(INS)—War preparations of the Soviets are continuing at a faster pace than ever. Every school pupil and employee is contributing something for the gigantic defense of the realm program which in a few years will make the Soviet union the most generally armed in the world, with every man, woman and child ready to help in some capacity.

"Osoaviakhim," the Society for Aerial and Chemical Defense, reported that $3,500,000 has been collected by popular subscription for building of airplanes. Thirty-six bombers were recently delivered to the army out of this fund, and 10 times that number are contemplated. Employees in the administration division of the State theaters are collecting money for a mammoth tank to be named "State Theaters." The artist guild is making up a purse of 20,000 rubles which it will present to the defense fund of the Union.

Thousands of trade union branches buy their own rifles and ammunition. As a result of the expenditures for army and navy noted in the federal budget are only part of the actual military expenses. Millions of people contribute directly as well as through taxation to the defense forces of the country.

The Bureau of Standards at Washington has hit upon a process which will make paper money wear longer. What we should like to have is a system which will make it last longer.—Uhrichville, O., Chronicle.

The Epic of the Air "WE" By Charles A. Lindbergh

CHAPTER III

I TAXIED up to a fence corner alongside of a small house and proceeded to tie down for the night. I had gained considerable respect for the wind in Kansas and Nebraska, so after turning off the gasoline and letting the motor stop by running the carburetor dry (a safety expedient to keep the ever-present person who stands directly under the propeller while he wiggles it up and down from becoming an aeronautical fatality). I pushed the nose of the plane up to a fence and, after blocking the wheels securely, tied each wing tip to a fence post and covered the motor and cockpit with a canvas in case of rain.

By this time the usual barnstorming crowd had gathered and I spent the remaining daylight explaining that the hole in the radiator was for the propeller shaft to go through; that the wings were not made of catgut, tin or cast iron, but of wood framework covered with cotton or linen shrunk to drum tightness by acetate and nitrate dope; that the only way to find out how it feels to fly was to try it for five dollars; that it was not as serious for the engine to stop as for a wing to fall off, and the thousand other questions which can only be conceived in such a gathering.

As night came on and the visibility decreased the crowd departed, leaving me alone with a handful of small boys who always remain to the last and can only be induced to depart by being allowed to follow the aviator from the field.

I accepted an invitation to spend the night in the small house beside the field.

The next morning I telephoned for a gas truck to come out to the field and spent the time before the truck arrived in the task of cleaning the distributor head, draining the carburetor jet wells and oiling the rocker arms on the engine.

While I was working one of the local inhabitants came up and volunteered the information that he had been a pilot during the war but had not flown since and "wouldn't mind takin' a ride again." I assured him that much as I would enjoy taking him up flying was very expensive and that I did not have a large fund available to buy gasoline. I added that if he would pay operating costs, which would be five dollars for a short ride, I would be glad to accommodate him. He produced a five dollar bill and after warming up the motor I put him in the cockpit and taxied through the mud to the farthest corner of the field. This was to be my first passenger.

The field was soft and the man was heavy; we stalled over the fence by three feet and the nearest tree by five. I found myself heading up a thickly wooded slope, which was sloping upward at least as fast as I was climbing in that direction, and for three minutes my Jenny and the slope fought it out over the fifteen feet of air between them. Eventually, however, in the true Jenny style we skimmed over the hilltop and obtained a little reserve altitude. I had passed through out of those almost-but-not-quite accidents for which Jennies are so famous and which so greatly retarded the growth of commercial flying during the post-war period.

I decided that my passenger was entitled to a good ride after that take-off and kept him up chasing a buzzard for twenty minutes. After we landed he commented on the wonderful take-off and how much he enjoyed flying low over the treetops; again assured me that he had flown a great deal in the war, and rushed off to tell his friends all about his first airplane ride.

The gasoline truck had arrived and after servicing the ship I took off again and headed west. I had no place in mind for the next stop and intended to be governed by my fuel supply in picking the next field.

The sky was overcast with numerous local storms. I had brought along a compass, but had failed to install it on the instrument board, and it was of little use in a suitcase out of reach. The boundary lines in the South do not run north and south, east and west as they do in the Northern States but curve and bend in every conceivable direction, being located by natural landmarks rather than by meridians and parallels. I was flying by a map of the entire United States, with each State relatively small.

I left Meridian and started in the direction of Texas, cutting across country with no regard for roads or railways. For a time during the first hour I was not sure of my location on the map, but soon passed over a railway intersection which appeared to be in the proper place and satisfied me about my position. Then the territory became wilder and again I saw no checkpoints. The storm areas were more numerous and the possible landing fields farther apart, until near the end of the second hour I decided to land in the first available field to locate my position and take on more fuel. It required nearly thirty more minutes to find a place in which a plane could land and take-off with any degree of safety, and after circling the field several times to make sure it was hard and contained no obstacles, I landed in one corner, rolled down a hillside, taxied over a short level stretch and came to rest half-way up the slope on the far side of the field.

A storm was approaching rapidly and I taxied back toward the fence corner at rather high speed. Suddenly I saw a ditch directly in front of me and an instant later heard the crash of splintering wood as the landing gear dropped down and the propeller came in contact with the ground. The tail of the plane rose up in the air, turned almost completely over, then settled back to about a forty-five-degree angle. My first "crack-up!"

I climbed out of the cockpit and surveyed the machine. Actually the only damage done was to the propeller, and although the wings and fuselage were covered with mud, no other part of the plane showed any marked signs of strain. I had taxied back about thirty feet east of the landing tracks and had struck the end of a grass-covered ditch. Had I been ten feet farther over the accident would never have happened. The usual crowd was assembling, the impact of the "prop" with the ground had been in all the neighboring fields and an airplane was a rare sight in those parts.

They informed me that I was halfway between Maben and Mathiston, Miss., and that I had flown 125 miles north instead of west.

When enough men had assembled we lifted the plane out of the ditch, pushed it over to a group of pine trees and tied it down to two of the trees. After removing all loose equipment I rode into Maben with one of the storekeepers who had locked up his business when he heard about the landing of the plane.

I wired Wyche at Americus to ship me one of the two propellers I had purchased before leaving, then engaged a room at the old Southern Hotel.

While waiting for the propeller I had extracted promises from half a dozen citizens to ride at five dollars each. This would about cover the cost of the "prop," as well as my expenses while waiting for it to arrive. When it did come I put it on the shaft between showers, with the assistance of most of Maben and Mathiston. I gave the plane a test flight and announced that I was ready to carry passengers when it was not raining too hard.

The Mississippians who were so anxious to fly when the propeller was broken immediately started a contest in etiquette. Each and every one was quite willing to let someone else be first, and it required psychology, diplomacy and ridicule before the first passenger climbed into the cockpit. I taxied over to the far corner of the field, instructed my passenger how to hold the throttle back to keep the ship from taking off, and lifted the tail around in order to gain every available foot of space for the take-off.

The first man was so audibly pleased with his ride that the others forgot their manners of a few minutes before and began arguing about who was to be next.

Norwich, Eng., to Have Statue of A. Lincoln

NORWICH, Eng. Jan. 10 —(INS)—Abraham Lincoln is to have a statue erected to his memory here, according to a decision made by the local city council.

America's great president came Norwich stock, his family at one time having resided in the city.

The funds for the erection of the memorial will be raised in the United States.

GAS FREE IN OLD TURKISH CAPITAL

CONSTANTINOPLE, Jan. 11—(INS)—Gas is free in Stamboul, the ancient quarter of the Turkish capital and will be as long as the new concessionaire cannot get the plans of the mains and the accounts from the former holders who say they are lost.

Numerous leaks and cases of asphyxiation are being reported daily but it is impossible to remedy them unless the old cobbled streets are taken up at the concessionaire's expense.

Turkey will soon have plenty of pork, too. For, in spite of the fact that the constitution declares Mohammedanism to be the state religion and the Koran forbids the eating of pork, a factory is soon to be opened in the Vilayet of Odana where wild boars are numerous. They do so much damage to the crops that the hunters will furnish the factory with plenty of supplies.

For some time past, hams, have been imported into Turkey from the Balkans, for there are enough Turks who do not refuse to eat this meat. And Mustapha Kemal says he will never allow the state religion to interfere with Turkish progress.

MALARIA GERMS AID VICTIMS OF PARESIS

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y., Jan. 11 —(INS)—More than one third of the patients suffering from paresis at the Binghamton State hospital have been so improved by the injection of malaria germs into their blood that they have been permitted to leave for their homes, according to Dr. Edward Gillispie, assistant superintendent of the hospital.

An improvement in one half of the patients suffering from this disease, which is caused by blood infection, has been noted, leaving about one third of the entire number unimproved by the treatment. About fourteen per cent of admissions to the institutions are suffering from paresis, Dr. Gillispie said.

While unusual results are being obtained by the treatment authorities do not claim it as a cure but have found that it creates a favorable response in the majority of cases under treatment.

Only Italian Tombs In Tyrol Graveyards

VIENNA, Jan. 11 —(INS)—"Italianization" of the South Tyrol has now been extended to the dead. According to an order issued by the Italian prefect of Bozen, dead Germans buried in the cemetery must change their nationality to Italian. The prefect ordered that all German inscriptions on gravestones shall be removed and replaced by Italian epitaphs.

The prefect's action followed his receipt of the following letter from Turati, general secretary of the Fascist party: South Tyrol, this former Austrian territory which owing to the Peace Treaties became a part of the Italian kingdom, must be Italianized in its past as well as in its future.

Austrian relatives of the South Tyrolean dead demand that the League of Nations force the Bozen prefect to rescind his order.

RADIO MEN TO MEET IN 3-DAY CONVENTION

NEW YORK, Jan. 11—(INS)—Some of the outstanding technical men of radio in the United States will get together when the Institute of Radio Engineers holds its annual convention here on Jan. 9th. The convention will last for three days.

The institute, which is of a purely scientific nature, and confines its activities to the furtherance of that field of electricity associated with radio telephone and telegraph communication, has a world-wide membership. Men of international renown grace its rolls, including Guglielmo Marconi, M. I. Pupin, inventor, Lee DeForest, Gen. G. O. Squier, and other famous inventors and radio technicians.

M. KACHALOV GETS CHALIAPIN' TITLE AS "ARTIST OF PEOPLE"

MOSCOW, Jan. 10—(INS)—The successor to Feodor Chaliapin's title of "Peoples' Artist," which was withdrawn several months ago because of the famous basso's anti-Communist attitude and failure to return to Russia for a series of concerts, is Vassily Ivanovich Kachalov, one of the most gifted actors in the country.

M. Kachalov is 50 years old and has appeared on the stage of the Moscow Art theater for many years. He has won particular fame in plays by Maxim Gorky, Ibsen and Chekov.

The title of "Peoples' Artist" carries with it more than mere honor. It entitles the recipient to a higher salary, the life use of one or more homes, a pension at full salary in case of disability, and an annuity for his widow and children.

ALL STREET CARS QUIT NEW MEXICO

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M., Jan. 11—(INS)—New Mexico will be without a street car line in any section of the state within a few weeks following permission granted today by the state corporation commission for abandonment of street cars between East and West Las Vegas.

Permission had already been granted for abandonment of street car lines in Albuquerque.

The Las Vegas and Albuquerque street car lines are the only two street car transportation companies that have been operating in the state for some time.

The Albuquerque line has employed a woman personnel since the world war. In its position for abandonment of the line at Las Vegas, the operators declared that the use of its street cars had decreased until a "passenger thereon is an oddity," and claimed the line had been operating a steadily increasing loss.

PRODUCTION CUTS PRICE

The present low prices of tobacco are due to the increased acreage in tobacco this year and the shift from dark to bright tobacco, according to Dr. G. W. Forster of the State College of North Carolina. Tobacco acreage in North Carolina has increased 10 per cent.

Nursing Record In Two Continents Hard to Equal

Nurse Waite of New Brighton writes: "After fifty-five years of tireless labor nursing mankind, I am now retiring."

While nursing in New York, in my early twenties, I was poisoned by food, my sister nurse recommended your wonderful CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS.

The doctor told me that I would have died had I not taken the pills. I am never without them and have prescribed them for thousands of my patients who were suffering with indigestion, gas and sour stomach, biliousness, sick headache and constipation. These pills are indeed a wonderful laxative, being purely vegetable, small and easy to take, children, as well as older people can swallow them easily. CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS. Practically without exception, seasoned motor car owners are appraising the new Hupmobile Six of the Century at hundreds of dollars more than its actual price.

Won by its striking eye appeal and distinction, scores of men and women are cancelling orders for costlier cars—confident that higher expenditure can bring no greater return in beauty, luxury and mechanical excellence.

So eager are local buyers to obtain delivery of this handsome new Hupmobile that demonstrations are being practically dispensed with by purchasers.

SERVING THE PUBLIC

The Circleville Herald is the servant of the people of Circleville and Pickaway county.

Did you ever stop to realize what this city and county would do if it did not have The Circleville Herald? How would you know whether your neighbor in the other end of the city, or county, was alive, if he had no telephone and even if he did you wouldn't want to call him to ask him if he were living. But if The Circleville Herald doesn't contain an item that he has died, you can wager he's still your live old friend.

The world moves on apace. But we would know little of it if there were no newspapers scattered here and there to tell us of it, how new inventions are made, whether Lindbergh landed or fell and was killed, or if that cousin or relative of yours has done something wonderful in another part of the globe.

THE CIRCLEVILLE HERALD

Will shortly add a new list of county correspondents to its already fast growing group of names. More sections of Pickaway county and this territory will be represented than ever before in the history of newspapers in Circleville.

Right now this paper is running such features as these:

"WE," Lindy's story	Dr. Copeland's daily health talks
"CHEVRONS," a serial story	A Daily Fashion Section
A Daily Society Page	A Classified Ad Section
The Cartoon "Jiggs"	The Cartoon "Just Kids"
A Daily Editorial Cartoon	Full Leased Telegraph News Service
A Daily Picture Service	A Complete Daily Wire Market Report

DID YOU EVER HAVE THESE FEATURES BEFORE IN CIRCLEVILLE NEWSPAPERS? BUT THE NEW CIRCLEVILLE HERALD HAS GONE TO A HUGE EXPENSE ADDING ALL THIS, INSTALLING A NEW FAST PRESS WHICH WILL BE IN OPERATION NEXT WEEK, AND IS MAKING AND WILL MAKE MANY MORE IMPROVEMENTS THAT CIRCLEVILLE AND PICKAWAY COUNTY MAY HAVE A LIVE DAILY NEWSPAPER WHICH WILL GIVE THEM SERVICE AND TO WHICH THEY CAN POINT WITH PRIDE.

SPLENDID GAME IS EXPECTED AT ATHLETIC GYM

Full Blooded Indians Will Provide Hard Opposition for Local Players.

In bringing the Seneca Indian basketball team to the C. A. C. court the club is giving the local fans the premier attraction for the season.

The Seneca Indians, a team of full blooded redskins will be a novelty for Circleville it being the first time in the history of local basketball that local fans have had an opportunity to see a team composed of Indians.

The Indians have an enviable record to their credit. They are coached by R. J. Fischer whom fans will remember through the Buffalo Lincoln team that appeared here last season. And no doubt the same display of good clean basketball will be demonstrated by the Indians as was put out by the Lincolns last season.

The club boys have been working hard since last Thursday and are in fine form. The Indians will have to step some to win Wednesday night. Fans can be assured a real fast and interesting game on tap.

Let's all go down to the C. A. C. gym and root for the home boys. They have a splendid team this season and deserve much better support than they have been receiving. The public owes the team and the club this support of their efforts to give Circleville good clean athletic entertainment.

In another month, the first of the major league baseball squads will be heading south and west for spring training. Sports pages will record the plaudits of the hold-out and the optimism of the new manager.

The annual salary squabbles will commence and contracts, signed and unsigned, will pass between owner and player.

What is all the old familiar pre-season ballyhoo going to lead to this year?

For one thing, probably another record season for attendance. The national pastime's popularity in many cities is limited only by the capacity of its parks.

Both President Heydler of the National League and President Barnard of the American are well pleased with the "healthy condition" of baseball this year. The child should produce a lot of dividends for its step-parents.

One thing missing thus far this year is scandal. Last winter at this time we had Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker weeping crocodile tears over their disgrace and Rogers Hornsby shouting that he wouldn't sell his pretty St. Louis stock certificates for any reasonable amount of money. "Swede" Risberg was throwing mud at the White Sox of years ago, and someone even went back and dug up a scandal about Casey at the Bat.

All this did baseball a lot of good. It started the prospective cash customers talking. Scandal, you know, never kept anyone away from the turnstile. Tell the paying guests the game is likely to be crooked and they'll crowd in to see how it's done.

Ty Cobb and Tris Speaker made more money than ever before in their lives because of a reported meeting under the grandstand many seasons ago.

Nineteen twenty-eight needs a "Dutch" Leonard.

Several new managers will try their wings this year, among them Rogers Peckinpaugh, Jack Slattery and Burt Shotton.

With the material at his disposal, any one of the three will accomplish a baseball miracle merely by getting his club to the top of the second division.

One can look for improvement this year from the Cincinnati Reds, the Philadelphia Athletics and the Chicago White Sox. The New York Giants are another club that is going to be harder to beat.

The National League race should be another thriller, with the St. Louis Cardinals improved as a team by the fact that Bob O'Farrell now can direct all his attention and energy towards playing ball. The Cubs have only to plug an infield gap to be more dangerous than ever, what with "Kiki" Cuyler added to an already high class outfield. The Reds, under Jack Hendricks, will be in there fighting, and with a few additions to his pitching and receiving departments, John McGraw has the Giants just about ready to grab another pennant.

The Pittsburgh Pirates, strengthened by the addition of "Sparky" Adams, who may prove the first real second baseman Barney Dreyfuss has acquired in a decade, will have their work cut out for them if they are to repeat their victory of 1927.

They say the Pirates have found another Warner boy in the wilds of Oklahoma, however, and if it's true it should just about break up the league.

In the American League, from this distance, one can see only the New York Yankees.

BIG BONUS IS GIVEN PENNEY EMPLOYEES

More Than Quarter Million Dollars Is Distributed by Store Company.

C. E. Brandt, manager of the J. C. Penney store in Circleville announces today that $320,000.00 was distributed in bonuses to the employees of the J. C. Penney organization for the year, 1927. This is the largest bonus distribution in the history of the company.

The J. C. Penney company has 954 stores operating in 46 states. Over 3,000 women employees participate in the bonus in their various stores and 145 women associates in their New York and St. Louis offices.

"They constitute a large and vital factor in our organization," said Mr. Brandt, when interviewed today. "In order to encourage them toward greater effort and to give them some special benefit within the keeping of the principle and policy of the organization—the Golden Rule—this special bonus plan has been adopted for them."

The bonus distribution for the women in the offices is based on salary and years of service. The women associates in the stores share in the bonus in proportion to their productivity in sales and length of service.

HORNSBY GOES TO BOSTON IN SURPRISE DEAL

Transfer of Noted Player From New York Giants Astounds Baseball World.

By LES CONKLIN

I. N. S. Staff Correspondent
NEW YORK, Jan. 11.—"Rogers Hornsby was traded for the best interests of the Giants."

This cryptic sentence was the only official explanation given today for the most astounding trade in modern baseball history, a trade which last night sent the best second baseman in the National League from New York to Boston in exchange for two ordinary players, catcher Frank Hogan and outfielder Jimmy Welsh. No cash was involved in the deal.

The bare and meaningless announcement given out by the New York Club stated that Manager John J. McGraw and President Charles A. Stoneham, "having in mind what we thought to be the best interests of the Giants," had traded Hornsby "after due deliberation." They declined to elaborate on the announcement, interpretation of which bids fair to cause as much speculation in the sporting world as President Coolidge aroused in the political world by his famous "I do not choose to run in 1928."

Reasons Sought

Stunned baseball fans and sports writers, searching for the colored gentleman in the woodpile, today advanced the following possible explanations for the virtual dismissal of the Giants' great batsman:

1. That Hornsby talked too much last year in telling friends what he would do when he became manager of the Giants, following the expected retirement of McGraw.

2. That the New York club wearied of Hornsby's legal difficulties. After refusing to sell his stock in the St. Louis Cardinals until he got his price, Hornsby was the winner of a suit for $94,000 recently brought against him by Frank Moore, Cincinnati betting commissioner, for an alleged gambling debt.

3. That Hornsby's habit of instructing other members of the Giants how to play their position caused resentment and dissension on the team.

4. That the trade was a philanthropic gesture to strengthen the Braves, who are on the rocks financially and have been playing to crowds no larger than a church congregation on a good golfing Sunday.

Plausible Explanation

The last explanation was deemed the most plausible one of the lot. The New York club frequently has played Santa Claus to the Braves in past trades. Instead of being made for the best interests of the Giants, the Hornsby trade may have been made for the best interests of the league. Strengthened by the Great Rajah, the Braves should perk up and draw huge crowds.

Certainly Jack Slattery, Boston's

new manager, must be convinced today that there is a Santa Claus, after all. He is getting a fighter player who led the Giants through the thick of the pennant fight last season and batted .361, a mark bettered only by Paul Waner. Slattery loses Hogan, who hit only .288 last season, and Welsh, who batted .287.

Leads As Batter

Hornsby, classed by many observers as the greatest batsman of all time, led the National League in batting for six consecutive years. In 1922 he clouted 42 home runs, a League record.

McGraw has acquired a much-needed catcher and outfielder, but he will have to make another deal for a second baseman to replace Hornsby unless he elects to take a chance on Andy Cohen, Buck Lai, the Chinaman, or some other rookie. McGraw may get Fresno Thompson from the Phillies, using Welsh in a trade.

Hornsby, in St. Louis, was stunned by news of the trade. And so were New York fans. But one man's wood alcohol is another man's scotch, for Boston fans are already claiming a first division berth.

Metropolitan Feature Film Depicts Life of Crooks in American Cities.

"Underworld," a picture as frank as an expose by a fearless metropolitan newspaper, is flashing its dramatic course on the screen at the Metropolitan theater.

This is one production that is smashing real in its treatment and that is also as absorbing as a drama of modern life.

It is impressive because it makes one think, in addition to being splendid entertainment. The unfolding of the lives of underworld characters in an environment of crime, their methods of preying on organized society, their ferocious struggles with men paid to uphold the law, and the intimate side of their natures in following out impulses and emotions in love and hate, provide the basis of the story written by Ben Hecht for Paramount.

The climax is extraordinarily thrilling, showing how a city street may take on the aspect of a battlefield, with police reserves rushing up to a house where a desperate gangster is trapped and has decided to die fighting. Searchlights, machine guns, grenades, automatic revolvers, shields and all the equipment of soldiery come into play when the house is stormed.

The gangland characters are splendidly portrayed by George Bancroft, gangster leader; Evelyn Brent, a girl whose moral consciousness is not awakened until she falls in love; Clive Brook, a man of good breeding who falls into a life of crime; Larry Semon, a crook with a sense of comedy and Fred Kohler, leader of a gang opposing Bancroft.

Josef Von Sternberg, who directed the underworld drama under Hector Turnbull's supervision, has turned out a remarkable fine piece of work.

The picture should cause much comment through its faithful depiction in a story sense of an astounding condition that exists in American cities today.

AVIATION'S GREAT YEAR

ONE of the big developments of 1927, has been the accomplishment of great feats of aviation, particularly in the flights across the Atlantic ocean. The possibilities of flight seem much grander and nearer today than they did a year ago. The year will long be notable in scientific history as one of marvellous development in linking the countries together through the air route.

The dreams of centuries are partly realized through these flights, and the every day use of airplanes by the common run of people seems much nearer than it did.

These flights have not been merely a scientific achievement, but they have had an effect on international politics which few people could have anticipated. Our fliers who landed in Europe have aroused the keenest admiration for American achievement. Col. Lindbergh in his recent very notable flight to Mexico has done wonders in straightening out disagreeable relations between the two countries.

It is coming to be better realized that facility of communication brings countries together in much more cordial relations. The hatreds existing between peoples give way to friendship when they exchange visits frequently. When aviators from the United States are constantly dropping over into Mexico for friendly relations with the Mexican people, something of the distrust with which Americans have always been viewed will disappear.

The aviation interest will start out on 1928 with bright hopes of a year of equally great achievement. Every year the production and operation of airplanes is becoming a more important business. An increasing number of young men with a mechanical turn of mind find it a profitable occupation, and their achievements thrill those of us who still keep our feet on the ground.

LINDY STILL DOES THINGS

THINGS are looking up for the United States when our favorite of the air, Col. Lindbergh, lights down in some foreign country, and the people get a sight of him, and are led to realize what American manhood is at its best.

The Mexican Congress has just passed a law which seems likely to end the unfortunate controversy over oil lands owned by Americans. While this result was largely accomplished by the tactful approach of the American ambassador, the friendly feeling excited by Col. Lindbergh seems to have helped this move along.

The flying Colonel's visits to the Central American countries, which have periods of being sore at Uncle Sam, should calm some ruffled plumage. You sometimes have to make friends with people before you can do business with them.

CROP VALUES INCREASE

THE calculations of the U. S. Department of Agriculture show that the value of farm crops increased $635,000,000 the past year over 1926. Probably one leading cause of this increased crop valuation, is that a great number of country people, discouraged with conditions in the farming industry, have quit that business and have gone to the cities. That tends to reduce the output. When the supply of anything decreases, but the demand remains the same, then prices rise. Thus the natural working of economic law seems to be doing something to improve the condition of the farmer.

It seems regrettable to see so many people leaving the healthy life of rural neighborhoods and hurrying into cities. But the result of that change is to make conditions better for those who remain, and to create a greater demand for their product.

MILLIONS FOR EDUCATION

THE DRIVE for the endowment fund for Yale university recently reached the sum of $20,000,000, and is still growing. This great sum will do good work, particularly in encouraging men of fine personality and brilliant ability to remain in the teaching profession, and use their influence to help inspire young men.

Hundreds of less famous institutions of learning, many of them small in numbers but fine in influence, should also get a share of the wealth of the country. The little college or academy in some rural section, not famous beyond the confines of its state, often exercises a wonderful influence on youth.

The officers and teachers of such schools are apt to work for very little pay, but they are inspired by seeing the results in manhood and womanhood that they turn out. While lavishing their generosity on the big colleges, the men of wealth should not forget the more struggling institutions, where the professors wear shiny coats, and the buildings need a bath of paint.

A GREAT BUG FIGHTER

DR. O. L. HOWARD, who recently resigned as chief entomologist of the U. S. agriculture bureau, after 33 years service, has had a remarkable record in fighting insect pests. We can see the result of his efforts in Ohio.

His publications on the diseases carried by the house fly were largely responsible for the nation wide effort to stamp out that pestiferous little creature.

Many of us can remember how terribly careless the old timers were about the fly pest. A perfect swarm of flies would come in through poorly screened houses and light on the food, contaminating the nourishment the people were about to assimilate. No wonder they got sick. We all owe a debt to these quiet scientists who are constantly working to exterminate the foes of man.

HE HAS A WASHING TOO

ENERGY BURNED UP SAME AS GASOLINE

Dr. Copeland Tells About the Advice He Gave to an Airman Who Wanted to Stay Alive Sixty Hours.

By ROYAL S. COPELAND, M. D.

United States Senator from New York.
Former Commissioner of Health, New York City.

A FEW weeks ago I had a telegram from a famous aviator. He told me of a contemplated endurance flight and asked me to suggest the foods best adapted for persons attempting a sixty-hour effort.

What would you say in reply to such a query? Sixty hours in your comfortable home would not be regarded as a long time. But I imagine that sixty sleepless, anxious, watchful, dangerous hours would make terrific demands upon mind and body.

One can go without food for sixty hours and not suffer anything more than pangs of hunger. But sixty hours in an airplane without sleep, and under the strain of constant flight, must make it important to keep the system in the fittest possible state.

In the first place, it is important to keep the system cleansed from poisons which might lessen the alertness of brain function and nerve response. To avoid this danger it is necessary to take an abundance of water.

Every cell of the body is bathed in fluid. To nourish it and cleanse it, there must be constant renewal of the fluid. In a sense, the cells and fibres of the body must be washed.

As I think about it, it is important to drink lots of pure water. That is the first item of advice to give the aviator.

In an air flight there is exposure to extreme cold. The body must be guarded against this and kept warm as possible, or its functions will be disturbed.

To meet the emergencies of the effort, to operate the mechanism of the plane, to keep awake and alert, there must be expended a tremendous quantity of energy.

Heat and energy are given the body by the burning up in its tissues of certain foods, called the "carbohydrates." These are the starches and sugars. The fats contribute in the same way.

The next thing to think about, is to feed the fats and carbohydrates. Cream, sugar, sweet chocolate, bread and portions of cheese, are splendid foodstuffs to supply these elements.

You will see why I recommended chocolate bars, cheese sandwiches, and lots of cream and sugar added to the coffee. The starch of the bread, the fat of the cream, and the sweet things will furnish heat and energy.

Of course there is need of foods to sustain and restore the muscles. The proteins satisfy this need. For this reason I advised the white meat of chicken and the cheese, which is rich in protein.

Certain minerals are needed; the whole wheat bread will supply these, or some of them. Coffee is stimulating and helps to keep one awake and alert.

In my telegraphic response, I said: "Take chocolate bars, whole wheat cheese sandwiches, white meat of chicken and hot coffee rich in sugar and cream, in thermos bottles. Drink plenty of water and try to take food at regular intervals of about four hours."

Such a menu would serve not only an aviator but anybody who needed concentrated meals. But of course, fruits, vegetables and milk should be added when the diet is to be continued for a long time. Do you agree with my menu?

Answers to Health Queries

K. C. M. Q.—What can be done for a strain in the region of the heart—would digitalis be helpful? It has persisted for three years.

A.—Digitalis might be very helpful but should be advised by your doctor who is naturally familiar with your condition. A heart affection demands specific attention in every instance. It is very important to avoid all undue exertion and excitement and to live a regular, normal life.

A. K. Q.—Would a heart condition in a boy of eleven, where two valves of the heart are open cause bleeding from the mouth two or three times daily—the boy is the picture of health otherwise?

A.—Possibly—why not have the doctor familiar with the child's condition advise you along these lines? Copyright, 1928, Newspaper Feature Service, Inc.

WORK IS STARTED ON BUREAU HOME

Agricultural Organization Begins Excavation for Office Building in Columbus.

Excavation for the new Columbus headquarters of the farm bureaus of Ohio was started last week, according to word received at the office of the Pickaway County Farm Bureau. The completed building, providing weather for building activity is favorable, will be ready for occupancy about May 1.

Announcement of the intentions of farmers to have their own headquarters in the Capital city was made here nearly two months ago. At that time the Ohio Farm Bureau Corporation, a subsidiary of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation, purchased a 99 year lease on property on East Broad street, six blocks from the State capital. Officials first planned to have the new building ready for reception of delegates at the annual meeting of the farm bureaus in Columbus on Jan. 30 and 31, but this plan had to be abandoned.

The building started last week is to be a two-story brick structure and basement containing 20,000 feet of floor space. Built as a permanent structure, it will adjoin the building already on the property to house headquarters of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation and all its affiliated groups, giving farmers of the state their first permanent headquarters.

In addition to furnishing office space for the state farm bureau the new headquarters will serve the Ohio Livestock Cooperative association, the Farm Bureau Mutual Automobile Insurance company, the Ohio Farm Bureau corporation, the Ohio Farm Bureau Service company, the Eastern States company (a subsidiary of the livestock cooperatives) and certain branches of the work of the Ohio Wool Growers Cooperative association, dairy associations and other cooperative groups of the state.

Mrs. Forestier was found lying in a pool of blood in the kitchen of her home. Her head had been nearly severed.

Gay
So toss away
That word "dismay;"
When troubles
Come
Just smile, and soon
Your winter snows
Will change
To June
And Life will always
Be at noon,
Now why can't you
As well be
Gay
As harboring
This word
"Dismay?"—

And what we mean to say
Is,
The way this old world
Treats you, friend,
From the beginning
To the end
And when you trip
Around Life's bend
Is up to you,
If you'll be gay
The sun will shine
Most every day;
Be glad and vow
That you will find
That everyone is
Good and kind
And do your best to
Please mankind;
There is no sense in
This dismay,
When you can just
As well be gay.

"G-d d-n it!" yelled Eadie and added his opinion of the gun and the man that invented it. There was still half a belt, it must be a jam. Eadie pounded the breech, pulled the bolt snapped the lever, did everything he could think of. Then he noticed that the bottom of the cylinder glowed a dull red. Ah! The water in the German gun is only sufficient to keep it cool for four belts. After that time the cylinder must be refilled. Eadie had never thought of that, but then machine gunners are not made in a day. The barrel had become hot, had buckled, and now the gun had fired its last shot. Specks danced before Eadie's eyes. He could see nothing but the empty field, liberally dotted with German dead.

Once more Eadie rested his head on his arms. Jake came and sat down beside him. Jake? Why, Jake was lying dead over there behind the hedge under Eadie's overcoat. Jake grinned, nevertheless, and extended his huge hand. Was it really Jake? Why, no. There was a girl there, dressed in black, with a white cap and apron. She held out a platter on which was a huge steak, garnished with butter.

"Oh, G-d!" shrieked Eadie. He staggered and fell across the breech of the gun. Three nights and two days without sleep, or rest, or food and all the time under the strain of battle. Sergeant Eadie had collapsed.

CHAPTER VII

Behind the Guns

Eadie opened his eyes with a start and was about to struggle, but the men that held him wore khaki uniforms, and their faces were sympathetic and kindly.

"Where yuh hit, buddy?" asked one. It was day and rain fell heavily. The field that had been so lonely the night before was covered with Americans, walking steadily, their rifles over their shoulders, and their bayonets dripping rain. As far as the eye could see they marched along.

"Where yuh hit?" asked the man again. Eadie tried to speak, but no words came. Practiced hands turned him over and explored under his blouse. "He's all right," said some one. "There's no blood an' I don't feel a thing."

"Yes," said a third voice, "shock

and gas, write it down. What's the name on that dog tag?"

"Here!" cried Eadie. "I'm all right. I just fell asleep a minute or two." His mind began to clear a little and he could see that there was an unfolded stretcher on the ground, that one of the men who had supported him was evidently a bearer, and that the other man was a doctor, for his collar bore the insignia of an officer of the medical corps.

"Sure," said the doctor, "we know. We're just going to fix it so you can have a little more sleep. You've got a little whiff of gas, I know the signs."

"No, no!" shouted Eadie, so that even the marching men turned to look at him. "I tell you I'm all right. Let me alone! I was evacuated for gas once before and I've had enough gas berries handed me ever since to keep the A. E. F. in jam a hundred years. Nix on that stuff. I'd spit my lungs right out on the ground and kick 'em over the bank before I'd go out for gas. No, sir! No more jawbone wound stripe for mine. One is enough." His hand flew to his holster and the gun seemed to leap out to meet it. Eadie swung the muzzle at the doctor and the stretcher bearers. It was lucky that it was empty, for his hand gripped trigger and butt-safely in a drowning man's clutch.

"Get the h-l away from me!" growled the sergeant. The doctor and his assistants complied immediately with more haste than dignity. A crazy man and a .45 are as dangerous a combination as gasoline and a match. Eadie watched them go grimly, then holstered his pistol and walked aimlessly up the hill a little way. "That's the way to handle the medical corps!" he muttered.

On the hilltop he paused. There was a wall of smoke far to the north that marked a barrage and tall black plumes in the distant fields showed where enemy shells were falling among the advancing troops. Along the hedge that marked the sunken cart path was a long line of recumbent figures, to which additions were constantly being made. These must be dead. Of the bitter conflict of the night before there was no sign except the German dead lying thickly and the blackened pile of junk that had been an enemy airplane. Jake was over there, and Lieutenant Connor, who, if he did not know much about being an officer, at least knew how to die like one. Eadie guessed that the Americans had made a general advance at daybreak. His watch now told him it was eight o'clock. The survivors of the garrison of the sunken road had probably gone on with the advance, or else had been relieved and sent to the rear.

"I'm going to be relieved, too," declared Eadie. If the ambulance could come up that road from the gulch then he could get out that way, decided the sergeant. He went down into the gulch, not looking at the dead Germans there and so up the opposite slope. Here the road joined another and Eadie took the south fork. Immediately he met infantry marching in column, a whole brigade, he thought, until he noticed the fresh uniforms, the shaven faces, and the brand new equipment. Replacements, these men were, going up to fill up the depleted ranks of some division. No, that wasn't it, he came replacements wouldn't be marching in column so near the front. This must be a fresh, untired division, going in to see what it could do.

"Where yuh goin'?" called Eadie. "To Berlin!" the men answered him with a cheer. Eadie was moved to laugh hoarsely. "There's bad boys up there in the woods that'll splash your new clothes all over mud," he called. "That Berlin road is kinda rocky."

A column of artillery, some Three Hundred and Something regiment that Eadie had never heard of followed the infantry, and batteries of artillery in the open and with no attempt at camouflage spat flame and shells at the enemy. From time to time tanks waddled across, looking like a flock of ducks in search of a pond.

A two-wheeled cart appeared around a turn and came hobbling toward Eadie. This cart had a tank on it and was used for carrying drinking water. The interesting thing about it was that it had upon its side the words, "Battery A," and the man that drove it was one Cracker Coombs, a man well known to Eadie.

"Hey!" called the sergeant, standing up.

"Hiyuh, sahgunt," replied Cracker, leaning up. "Wanta ride? Climb on." Eadie complied gladly enough. "Where's the battery?" he asked, as Cracker clucked his horses forward once more.

"Down the road a piece," replied the driver. "It's a h-l of a long way to come to watch three an' a times a day. Where yuh been at, sahgunt, Eadie?"

"I'll say," agreed Eadie. "I've had enough of it for a while. The battery been doing anything?" "Ain't fired nary a shot yet. We had two showdown inspections and a seventh parade. It was a good one, too, only two o' them boche planes flew over an' broke it up."

"That's a h-l of a way to fight a war," remarked Eadie. "How come haven't they got any ammunition or what?" "I ain't studyin' about that a-tall," said the driver. "I got to tote watter whether they fights or not. I hearse we was to back up some rignunt but they took foot in hand an' done gone an' no one knew wheat to shoot."

"Eum!" said Eadie. "well, maybe that's right. I was with an outfit an' didn't hear an American shell for two or three days. How's the outfit feedin' now?"

"Right slim!" said the driver. In a few minutes the cart turned off the road and Eadie was home. From the seat of the cart he could see the battalion strung out along a field, the guns of the three batteries in position behind them piles of shells, and the gunners sitting idly around in shell cases smoking.

A long line of harnessed limbers hid themselves in the shadow of a row of trees. Men wandered aimlessly about, some shaved or cleaned the mud from their clothing, others dug themselves dugouts, some slept. Behind a clump of bushes was a pile of helmets, rifles and miscellaneous equipment, with here and there a patch of white cloth. Signs such as these pointed to the presence of a dressing station in those bushes, and that pile of arms contained the equipments and weapons taken from the wounded.

"Here we are," cried Eadie, leaping down. The water cart always stops near the kitchen, thus bringing Eadie immediately to the place he sought. "How's chances on chow?" cried the sergeant.

"Ain't got much chow," said the cook dubiously. "Spud and the mess sergeant are off to see can they find a ration dump to steal a little for supper. We just got through with breakfast an' I put on everything I had."

"D-n and d-n," cried Eadie. "I haven't set my teeth into food for three days!" The men were all looking sadly at each other when the first sergeant suddenly appeared.

"Ta! Sergeant Eadie!" he cried. "They had the rumor around this morning that you were dead. I knew it was a lie. I bet you found a steam heated dugout I hear the boche have the major wants to see you the minute you get back. I think he's got a new job for you. Maybe he's going to send you to officers' training camp. There's a detail goin'. Go see him. You better shave first, though, and clean yourself up a little."

"That's right," said the cook. "You go shave an' see the major an' when you come back I'll have something for you to scoff."

"Where's the liaison detail hang out?" asked Eadie.

"Soft," replied the first sergeant. "They got an old Jerry dugout up on the hill there."

Eadie went in the indicated direction, after filling his canteen at the water cart. The dugout he found easily, for Baldy was in the doorway. "Well, I'm d-d!" exclaimed Baldy. "Yuh look like yuh been to war."

"Well, I haven't," said Eadie. "I've been snipe hunting. How's every thing?"

"Ah, I knew it was you!" cried a voice, and Short Mack poked his child's face from the door. "I dreamed about money last night. What's the matter, did the M. P.'s chase you back?"

"I'm going to shave," said Eadie.

hitching forward his musette. "That's something Short Mack can't do."

The sergeant removed slicker, belt, and blouse. His gas mask he laid handily by and the major's field glasses beside it.

"Where'd you get them?" cried Short.

"A little bird flew down with 'em in his beak," answered Eadie, laying out his shaving tools.

"You're the cheapest illegitimate I know!" foamed Shorty. "If you had brains enough to be simple, I'd knock your nose off its trunnions! Gimme a look through 'em."

Short took the glasses and began to sweep the horizon with them, while Eadie lathered his face.

"Where's the red-headed guy?" asked Baldy.

"He's dead," Eadie lathered in silence and then laid the brush gingerly on his gas mask. "Hold the mirror will you?" he asked.

"What did it, shell or grenade?" asked Baldy, holding the steel mirror before Eadie's face.

Scrape, scrape, went the razor. Eadie pulled his nose out of the way removed a budding mustache and shook the soap onto the ground.

"Bullet," said he. "They had a machine gun up and he stopped one. He died in a minute."

"Ch," grunted Baldy. He changed hands on the mirror and watched Short sweeping the horizon with the major's glasses. Eadie continued to shave. Jake's death had slight effect on these two, he thought, but then they had not known him very well. He, the sergeant, was not as affected as he might have been. He was surprised at this himself. But then how many men had he met, good lads all, in hospital in the States, in the casual company, on the transport, in rest and replacement camp, on trains, all up and down France, infantrymen, artillerymen, engineers, police, men of every branch of the service. Good lads they were, and he had talked and joked and drank with them a day or two, even a week, then they were gone and he never saw them again. He did not even know their names. Mike, Red, Hoop, Corporal, the Barber, N'Awins, they were called. Where were they now? True, he might meet them again, but Jake he was sure he would never see. A slight chill went down his spine then. Who could tell what minute he or Short or Baldy might follow the same path that Jake had taken?

"That's a sorry shave you're givin' yourself," remarked Baldy.

"I know it," said Eadie, "but I'm in kind of a hurry. The major wants to see me. Now, then, Short; give us those glasses. You know I'm a bird that keeps everything valuable right on me."

The battalion P. C. Eadie found easily enough. It was in another German dugout, evidently a large one. At the door he paused and made some attempt to brush off his clothes, but the task was hopeless. Anyway, it would be better to go in a battle-stained warrior. The effect would be more dramatic. Eadie knocked.

"Come in!"

The sergeant lifted aside the blanket that served as door and stepped in. A number of lanterns lighted the place, and Eadie could see a table, a telephone, maps, fungus-whitened beams, and the dim outlines of three officers. With difficulty, Eadie discovered the major, sitting at the table.

"Sir," said Eadie, saluting. "I was directed to report to the major, I'm Sergeant Eadie of A battery." He squared his shoulders as he spoke, and felt a little sorry that the light was so poor and hence the officers could not see his wound stripe.

The major swung around in his chair and looked Eadie from top to toe.

"Sergeant Eadie, oh, yes," he said quietly. "You were detailed to go forward with the infantry September 23, weren't you? Where have you been ever since?"

"Sir," began Eadie, "the division went to bits. The officer we were with was killed and the battalion commander after him. We stayed until night, all the officers we knew were killed, the men were retiring, and so we retired, too."

"Did you ask for any fire during the day?"

"Yes, sir," said Eadie, "we fired a rocket in the afternoon, but the bar rage only lasted a few minutes."

"That's right," spoke up an officer from the shadows. "You remember major, that the brigade called up and made us cease firing because the shells were bursting about two miles in rear of the line reported by the airplane?"

"Where did you go the next day? Why didn't you come back?"

"Well, sir, we were on the way back when we met Lieutenant Connor and he made us go along to help lay wire."

"Lieutenant Connor? He isn't with this regiment any more?"

"He had a Signal corps detail from the Third brigade, sir."

"Well, he might have that. He was transferred to another regiment of the brigade. The brigade was split up at the opening of the attack and he might have had a detail from the Third brigade, but that doesn't allow you to go with him."

"He ordered me to go with him, sir, and I thought he was still with the regiment."

"Where's Lieutenant Connor now?"

"He's dead, sir."

"Well, where's the man that went with you?"

"He's dead, too."

"Oh, he is? Hmmm. Now, listen. We had a little affair with you on the Marne. You were sent out to find a bridge and if we'd waited for your report, we'd still be at Chateau Thierry. There was some kind of a rumor around that you were gassed. I think if a certain general order were extended to include gas cases there'd be a d-d sight fewer evacuations for gas. Well, this time you do the same stunt. There's been too much of this going out on detail and turning up a week later, with some feeble alibi. I think I've got you. Anyway, you're under arrest while I investigate. Tell your B. C. and your first sergeant that's all."

The sergeant saluted and went out. He was tired, his legs ached, and his mind craved sleep. Between the Germans and his own officers, a man had a tough time in this war. On to the kitchen then.

At the kitchen he filled his cup with coffee and the cook, wiping his hands on his apron, took off the stove a messkit full of some kind of gray matter.

"What's this?" demanded Eadie.

"It's good for yuh," replied the cook. "Eat it. It's bacon grease an' stirred with them pavin' stone biscuits stirred up in it."

Eadie proceeded to eat. The stuff tasted good, especially since it was his first real meal in several days. His head reeled a little bit from fatigue and his legs kept going to sleep. He sat on a ration box, his back to the warmth of the rolling kitchen, and ate, drank coffee, and thought upon his lot. Jake had the luck after all. What was there in this war for a man? Work and fight and sleep in the mud and go without food, and be bedeviled by officers all the time. Three days of fighting and killing. Perhaps tonight he would have to go on the lines again. Winter was coming on and it was going to get colder every day. All honor to the French and British who had stood this misery for four years. As for his own particular troubles, they were annoying, but not serious. He could find some member of the wire-stringing detail, or even Lieutenant Harvey to testify for him. The general would say whether he had been a goldbrick or not. He had captured a machine gun single-handed, which was not a task performed by goldbricks.

"How's it go?" asked the cook.

"Good," said Eadie. "I've eaten lots worse. I wish I had some soft bread to wipe out my messkit with." He got up and walked toward the water cart, intending to rinse out his cup.

Whooooo! A sudden swelling roar, a roar like that of a lion a thousand times magnified. A shell! A near one! Eadie went for the ground but he felt iron going into him ere he started.

When things cleared a little bit, he found himself on the ground, lying on his side. He opened his eyes and then raising his head looked about him. The place was deserted. Far away some one called wildly, but there was no one in sight. Eadie looked the other way. A column of steam hid the place where the rolling kitchen had been, but Eadie could hear hissing and see a shattered blackened wheel, and the wreck of a marmite can lying on the ground. Beyond the marmite was the cook, one leg gone, and dead. The K. P. lay a little farther away, also dead, horribly so.

Eadie lay down again quietly. He was hit and hit bad, he could tell by the way he felt. And he had been hit right beside the guns, in front of the entire battalion. A real hit. No more sound-off about jawbone wound stripes! No more wise cracks about going over the hill! The ground felt soft and comfortable. Right in back of the guns! That shell had been a fast traveler. How many years ago had it been when he had told Ham that a shell could be heard five seconds before it burst? This latest arrival had but roared once and Eadie had felt its claw almost as soon as he heard the roar. There were feet pounding now, muttered comments, excited cries.

"Battery A's kitchen!" "They're all dead! —! Lookit the cook!"

"Get back, men, don't gang up around here! Get back! Another shell may land any minute! Where's the doctor?"

A dozen hands turned Eadie over and he could see a circle of white faces looking at him.

"Where'd it get yuh?" they cried.

"In the side," answered the sergeant. He was surprised to hear how natural his voice sounded. There were men there he knew, looking at him as though he were some strange and fearful object. Off came his belt, his blouse was torn open, up with the shirt, and Eadie, raising one elbow, saw it. A great bunch like an inverted cup and in the center of this bunch a round jagged hole, with a tiny splash of blood on one side. He lay down again and gritted his teeth at the sting of the iodine.

"Got any more?" asked the first-aid man who was putting on the bandage.

"No, that's the only one," said Eadie. "Did it go in?"

"Yup, it went in." "I don't feel weak or anything. I don't want to get shoved out with a flesh wound."
